

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

SYSTEM) BILL.—[BILL 24.]

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. W. Ewart.)

MR. HUMBERSTON observed, that there was a very general feeling in the country in favour of uniformity of weights and measures, but it was desirable that that object should be accomplished by much more simple machinery than was proposed by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W.

Ewart). Englishmen were not, in his opinion, prepared to give up their ancient system, to which they had been so long accustomed, for one bearing foreign names, the introduction of which, if sanctioned by the House, would not be so easily accomplished as the hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine. He did not see how their foreign trade would be extended by the adoption of that system; because, in most of the foreign countries with which they traded, the metric system did not exist. Even supposing it was introduced in this country, he did not see how they could introduce it into their colonies. How were they to compel its adoption by the colonies or in India, where there was a strong opposition to such measures? He did not think that either the external or internal trade of the country would be promoted by the introduction of the metric system. All that was required by the agricultural interests was uniformity in the system by which their produce was bought and sold. The great majority of the buyers and sellers were practical people; and it was for such persons, and not for scientific men, that the House should legislate. As matters stood, however, he could but think that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr.
W. Ewart) had confined his Bill to a proposal for rendering the weights and measures of the country uniform; according to the system now in force, he would have received general support. The common sense of the country was against the adoption of the metric system, and when the Question was put that the Speaker should leave the chair he should say "No."

MR. ADDERLEY considered that the principle of this Bill had been already sufficiently discussed, having been twice affirmed by the House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Humberston) said he preferred a simple system, but the great merit of the metric system was its preeminent simplicity. The present system was confused; and, therefore, they sought to introduce the simpler system, not only on account of its intrinsic merits, but because other countries had adopted it. As to the colonies, the fact was they could not adopt the metric system because we prevented them. Many of the eminent firms in England had been obliged to adopt the system, by reason of their extensive dealings with other countries, and they found it to work well and satisfactorily, and by reason of its simplicity they were enabled to carry on their business with a reduced staff. There was a letter in The Times to-day, signed "Decimal Point," only the point was omitted, in which he supposed the latest arguments against the metric system were embodied. It was said the English yard was as good as the French metre, and no doubt they might have done the same thing with the yard as with the metre if they had been foremost in the field; other nations would have taken to the system with our yard for its unit; but the question now was, whether they could force other nations to adopt our yard in lieu of their already adopted metre. The chief advance made by the metric system was neither the application of the decimal or any other system of notation, but the adoption of a single unit, whether yard or metre, of all measure, linear, or of area, of weight, or capacity. The internal trade of the country required the adoption of an universal standard as well as the external trade. He conceived that none would be more benefited by the introduction of this simple system than the agricultural interests. A bushel of corn, or rood of land, had become unintelligible terms, and every transaction was in uncertain measures and intricate calculations. The common sense of the country was not against this simpler system, any more than the common sense of the House, which had twice affirmed the principle. It only required to be known, and was sure of adoption. Legislation was wanted only to give legal force to contracts made in its terms.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he must deny that the principle of the metric system had been affirmed by the House. The Bill had only been allowed by the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and the House to be read a second time in order that the question might be discussed in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (The Use of Metric Weights and Measures allowed.)

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he objected to the words in line 10,

"That from and after the passing of this Act the weights and measures of the metric system shall be legal weights and measures."

A clause of that description could not come into operation until there existed in the country a power of verification by comparison of metric weights and measures in use with an authorized standard. In fact, the clause involved that most important question, whether they were going to establish a new national standard, and to have copies of it sent through the country, in order that Inspectors of weights and measures might have the opportunity by comparison of verifying the metric weights and measures. They did not proceed in reference to a national standard by mere enactment. They had, first of all, a Commission of competent men to ascertain—in fact, to make the standard. There was no metre in this country which they could take as authoritative without careful examination by a competent Commission. When the Houses of Parliament were burnt, the national standard yard was destroyed. But they proceeded to restore it—not by a simple enactment saying that something should be a yard, but by appointing a Commission consisting of some of the most scientific men in the kingdom, who carefully, by comparison with copies of the standards which existed, restored the national standard yard which was now deposited in the Exchequer. Now, in regard to the metre, they were in a somewhat similar position. They would have to proceed by a careful inquiry by a Royal Commission, and make a metric standard. They did not know what a metre was. They were told it was to be found in Paris, and that a metre had been deposited in the Royal Society half a century ago, but had it ever been ascertained to be correct? Great changes took place in metallic substances, and who knew whether the metre in the Royal Society was correct? They seemed to be proceeding without proper information. They could not declare that certain weights and measures should be legal until they had first of all made their standard. They proposed to enact that certain weights and measures called metric should be legal; but what were they? The answer ought to be, "They are certain weights and measures which correspond with a standard deposited in some State Department." They had not deposited any standard. They had not made any standard. Therefore they were proceeding too rapidly. His hon. Friend ought first of all to have provided that a national standard should be constructed and deposited in a State Department, and that Inspectors and others under the Weights and Measures Acts might have the opportunity of comparing and verifying other weights and measures by reference to it. That appeared to be a very necessary preliminary. His opinion was that his hon. Friend would do better not to attempt to establish any new national standard. He should merely confine himself to enacting that contracts should not be deemed invalid on the ground that the weights and measures therein referred to were metric weights and measures. If a new standard metre were now constructed, and copies sent to all the considerable towns of the kingdom, it was doubtful whether any retail trader would at this time go to the expense of providing himself with a metric set of weights and measures, at a cost of £30 or £40, merely upon the chance that some customer might prefer to buy his tea or sugar by metric weights instead of by ounces and pounds. He doubted whether, in the retail trade of this country, the metrical system would ever voluntarily be adopted. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend would act upon the suggestion which he had made.

MR. AYRTON said, he had been one of those who, when it was proposed to make the metric system compulsory, considered it would be proceeding too fast; but he now thought that, if the House adopted the Bill as it stood, they would be proceeding too slowly. He had anticipated some of the objections of the right hon. Gentleman, and had given notice of Amendments which he thought would tend to improve the Bill as a working measure. There would be a great difficulty in at once enacting that the standard of the Royal Society should be the legal standard of the metrical system, as there was no law governing that society in its care of that standard, and therefore one of the Amendments suggested that the Bill should enact what were the equivalents between the metrical system and the present recognized standards. That being done, another clause should authorize the Government to prepare standards, and six months would be sufficient time for the preparation of those standards, to be kept in the Imperial exchequer. Then as to the distribution of exact copies of the standards throughout the country, he really did not see that that would be so expensive a proceeding as to cause any alarm in that House. If the course he had suggested were adopted, the public would acquire a theoretical and practical knowledge of those standards, and in time they would be so well informed of them that it would be agreed that their use might be made compulsory, which would be an enormous gain to the country.

MR. BLAKE said, that from his experience of the working of the metric system in France and Russia, he was convinced of its great advantages. He had been particularly impressed by the facility and the rapidity with which it was applied even in the most uncivilized parts of the latter country. He had very little doubt that, after a few years' experience of its advantages in England, the House would be able to pass a measure which would render its adoption compulsory. He admitted that the system would not become general until it was made compulsory; but that not being possible at the present moment, he thought the Bill was the best that could be devised to further the adoption of the metric system.

MR. PACKE expressed his approval of the metric system, which would be a great convenience to farmers in their corn transactions. He had always been a friend to the adoption of the principle contained in the Bill, which was so simple that it only required the lapse of a short time to convince the people that the decimal system was the simplest, and would in the end be found the best. Nothing could be of greater advantage than the establishment of a uniform system of weights and measures throughout the country.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it would be necessary in the first place that they should obtain a proper standard. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart) said that the Royal Society had a proper metre which was deposited there in 1816, and that that would serve as a standard; for himself he knew nothing of it, but it was obvious that, having been there for half a century, it would not be advisable to adopt such a standard off hand. Three Commissions or Committees had formerly been appointed on this subject, all of which had arrived at different conclusions. Until they had a proper standard furnished he did not see how they were to make any satisfactory progress in this matter. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) proposed by one of his Amendments to define exactly what a metre was, and he declared that it was 39·371 inches. With all respect he could not regard the hon. and learned Gentleman as a decisive authority upon such a point, especially when he remembered that various commissions of savans had reported diversely as to the standard metre of France. Previous inquiry must take place before Parliament could pass any enactment upon that subject.

MR. AYRTON said, he had not ventured to define the equivalent of the metre, but had taken it from the Bill before the House. The exact proportion of those measures was a subject for very grave consideration, but with the enormous body of the civil service at their back, he thought it would not be a very difficult matter for the Government to ascertain the exact proportion between the metre and an English yard in inches and decimals. Considering the immense sum paid for the civil service, that was not too much to expect from them. He did not undertake to establish the precise equivalent, but held that the figures proposed to the House were to be taken simply as representing a principle.

MR. LOCKE said, he was astonished to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that he did not know what was a metre. His predecessor had experienced a similar difficulty, and it appeared that the Government, with all the civil service at their command, had not been able to solve the difficulty. If the right hon. Gentleman had only run over to Boulogne he would have found a standard, for there was not a town in France of any importance where the standards of weights and measures were not kept. He really thought that, considering our entente cordiale with France, though it might not be what it was two years ago, had his right hon. Friend written a polite note to the Minister of the Interior, he would have obtained the necessary information. But the right hon. Gentleman, with all his ability, was not of an inquiring turn of mind, and had been content to remain as ignorant upon the point as he was last year. The right hon. Gentleman was surrounded by savans, and he had told the House that three sets of savans had reported upon the point, but had not been able to agree. If the right hon. Gentleman would procure a set of weights and measures from France, there would be no difficulty in reproducing them without the aid of savans. The Board of Trade, however, did not like trouble, nor did it approve any measure that was likely to give trouble. Any ordinary mechanic who worked with square and rule would solve the difficulty; but let the right hon. Gentleman keep clear of the savans, for, like the tailor of Laputa, who made his coats on mathematical principles and never fitted anybody, our savans could never do anything except in the most scientific and therefore most incomprehensible manner. He thought the Amendments of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) might be adopted, leaving it to the Board of Trade to discover the actual relations between English and French measures. When that was done, the result could be inserted in the Schedule.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he was not aware that in the corn markets of the West Riding of Yorkshire any difficulty was experienced with the present modes of measurement, however much it might be otherwise in Leicestershire. There was at present a standard in every town and county in England, and there was no difficulty in ascertaining what it really was. The usual mode of selling was by the load, consisting of three bushels, and the bushel of corn was fixed at 60lb. weight, so that no metric system was required to make those bargains intelligible. He could not help thinking that this Bill, as a permissive measure, would create much more confusion than at present existed.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART thought that a simplification of the weights and measures throughout the country was very much required, and in that opinion he was borne out by the evidence of the witnesses who had been examined before the Committee, of which he had been a member.

Mr. ADDERLEY begged to express his gratification that the opposition of the Government had been confined to so small a point. The legalization of contracts in this country under the metric system was the pith of the Bill, and as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had expressed his readiness to introduce clauses for that purpose, he would advise the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart) to accept that offer if he could not carry his Bill in its entirety. In reference to the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for East Retford (Viscount Galway) he said, that in his county there were thirty-six different bushels, and he was informed that in Lancashire there were more than double that number. With respect to the creation of a standard, there could be no difficulty in obtaining an actual metre from Paris, and the clauses of the Bill would not come into operation until the metre was ascertained. The great advantage of the system was, that if they once got the metre they had ascertained the whole system. No other standard was required, every kind of measure being taken from that one unit. Copying an existing standard was not required, as when the standards were destroyed with the Houses of Parliament, fresh calculations were required to enable them to be replaced. A Royal Commission, therefore, would be of no use. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) spoke of enacting a scale of equivalents, but the Bill as it stood did that. If the Bill could not now be carried through the House on account of the Members not being sufficiently acquainted with the subject, he should advise its promoters to accept the proposal of the Government, which would place the measure in quite a new position before the country. Once legalized, the system would soon recommend itself; and then, whatever further provisions might be found necessary, would be more easily adopted.

Mr. W. EWART said, he must complain that his right hon. Friend had given him no notice of the views with which he regarded the Bill or of his intention to oppose it. He thought he was entitled to such information in common justice and courtesy. The metric system was used in different parts of the country, and all the Bill proposed was to legalize what had been done under it. His right hon. Friend, without notice, had proposed an Amendment which was opposed to the whole Bill. He had tried to sound the right hon. Gentleman as to his intentions, but the right hon. Gentleman only replied in an oracular manner. "I shall be ready for you." The standard now in the possession of the Royal Society had been sent from France, and had been used on various occasions. The standard he proposed to introduce would unquestionably be one that could generally be applied. He would ask his right hon. Friend if he would agree to the appointment of a Commission for the purpose of determining a good standard, and whether he was prepared to bring in a Bill to legalize contracts made upon the metric system, because if he would do so he would withdraw the Bill now under discussion, believing that the Government would be enabled to bring forward a better measure than any which could be introduced by an individual Member of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman would not do so, no other course remained open to him but to proceed with the Bill.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, he was sorry that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) seemed to think that he had been taken by surprise in the matter. He had never said that he would bring in a Bill on the subject. He had said that he should have no objection to propose a clause to something like this effect:—

"That notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of Parliament, no contract should be deemed invalid or open to objection on the ground that the weights and measures therein expressed were those commonly known as the metric weights and measures, and that the table (to be annexed) should be deemed to set forth the equivalents between the imperial and metric systems."

Legalizing contracts expressed in metric terms was a very different thing from establishing a new national standard. The one he was prepared to do, but the other he could not support. To establish a new standard, leaving all the present weights and measures in operation, would not tend to the simplification of commercial transactions. They had for years been trying to secure uniformity, and if it could be accomplished, it would be most desirable; but custom and usage were stronger than Acts of Parliament in such matters. He was not sanguine that the permissive sanction of a system would lead to its introduction. He had no wish at present to go beyond the recommendation of the Astronomer Royal, which was not for a new national standard, but only for a recognition of the relation between foreign measures and our own standard. He could not agree to the establishment of a new standard, as proposed by the Bill. If his hon. Friend would defer his Bill until he had seen the clauses which he proposed to submit, he would be able to decide whether or not they met his views. The object of his hon. Friend was to legalize contracts expressed in the terms of the metric system, and the clauses referred to would do that.

Mr. AYRTON thought that the object of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart) would be attained if he accepted the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. W. EWART said, it was rather hard that his unfortunate Bill should be treated so summarily when it had already been on the paper for more than a month. Would his right hon. Friend consent to the appointment of a Commission in addition to laying the clause upon the table?

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, he could not give any undertaking of that nature without conferring with his Colleagues. The proposal he had made was a reasonable one, and beyond it he was not prepared to go.

Mr. COBDEN said, that he had been a little puzzled to understand his right hon. Friend's distinction between a Bill to declare that certain contracts under a certain system of weights and measures should be legal, and a measure declaring that such contracts should not be illegal. He knew that his right hon. Friend had a very discriminating mind, and was sometimes able to perceive subtle distinctions where he must confess that he himself was at fault. In the present instance, he had not been able to gather the full purport of the distinction made. There was another difficulty through which he could not see his way. He understood that his right hon. Friend proposed that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart) should put the Bill in the form he suggested, and that he would give, on the authority of the Board of Trade, certain equivalents representing the relative proportion between the French and English weights and measures, but his right hon. Friend did not answer the question how he was going to ascertain the standard that would be satisfactory. He wanted to know from his right hon. Friend how he was to get the table of equivalents. If his right hon. Friend would satisfy the hon. Member for Dumfries that he was prepared to give those equivalents, and to put the Bill in a form that would carry out the object he contemplated, he would advise his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries to postpone the measure in order that his right hon. Friend might propose the Bill in his own form, on the understanding, however, that his right hon. Friend would supply the House with the information they required, and which could only be ascertained authoritatively from the Board of Trade. If that were done, they could, before the end of the Session, have the Bill in a form that would satisfy his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, and would attach to his right hon. Friend the responsibility as well as the credit of being the author of it.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH remarked that in his opinion the difference sought to be established was merely one between fact and principle. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Milner Gibson) had simply asserted a fact, whereas the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) wished to establish a principle.

Mr. W. EWART said, that upon the understanding that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade was prepared to undertake what he had proposed to the House, he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Mr. AYRTON begged to second the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart), as his right hon. Friend had agreed to bring in a clause legalizing the employment of the metric system, and had undertaken to propose the true equivalent between the metric system and the imperial standard in use in this country. On that understanding he would leave the Bill in the charge of his right hon. Friend.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Wednesday next.

CHIEF RENTS (IRELAND) BILL (Lords).
[BILL 52.]—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the House was entitled to some explanation of the objects of the Bill.

Mr. Milner Gibson

MR. LONGFIELD said, that he had, on a former occasion, made a long statement to the House in explanation of the objects of the Bill, and his only desire was to save tiring hon. Members with a repetition. On that occasion the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) was unfortunately absent. The Bill was of a permissive character, and sought to facilitate the redemption of Chief Rents in Ireland without necessitating the expensive course that was now necessary.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

COLONEL DUNNE said, that this Bill was to introduce into Ireland the recognition of limited interests in property, not at present recognized by the law of England. He considered it undesirable that there should be different legislation in this country and in Ireland, and he therefore suggested that the provisions of the Bill should be extended to England.

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART expressed a hope that the Bill would not be subjected to any unnecessary delay, as any measure which would simplify the management of property in Ireland would be attended with great benefit. The Bill would make a great improvement in the law of Ireland, and he could see no reason why it should not be passed into law.

MR. BRADY said, that the fourth clause of the Bill gave the power to any possessor of a head rent to sell it to the person in possession of the land, and to the person in possession of the land to buy it, and to make it a charge upon his successor. He thought that would be very objectionable, and considered the Bill wholly unnecessary.

MR. BAGWELL said, the Bill was a permissive one, and was much required. He wished it were compulsory, as great good would be effected by it.

MR. GEORGE said, he thought that a Bill of such importance ought to have been introduced by the Government and not by a private Member. If it would be good for Ireland it ought to be good for England, and as it was the tendency of the day to assimilate the law of the two countries, a Bill of this importance should be in the hands of the Government, and ought not to be brought forward without an expression of opinion on the part of the Irish Law Officers. It was a permissive Bill, and it was found that permissive Bills were generally inoperative in Ireland. He hoped that if it were passed it would be confined to perpetuities, and would not be extended to leases for a term of years; and provision would be made to prevent life tenants of the head rent and the land from acting in a fraudulent manner.

COLONEL FRENCH said that, in his opinion, in the proposed and similar legislation, property in Ireland had been hardly dealt with; in fact, he looked upon the Incumbered Estates Act as robbery by Act of Parliament. However, the greatest objection he had to the present measure was that it would be entirely useless, and would lead to greater complications and difficulties than at present existed. If there were any necessity for such a measure it ought to be taken up by the Government, and not left in the hands of a private Member. He begged to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. LONGFIELD expressed a hope that that Motion would not be agreed to. The arguments of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) were about the most absurd he had ever listened to, and, in fact, were founded on complete ignorance. As to making that Act applicable to England as well as Ireland, it was forgotten that the whole law of landlord and tenant in Ireland was entirely different from that of England; and the present Bill, necessary though it was for Ireland, was, therefore, not suitable for England. He was quite willing to adopt any Amendment that might be suggested to protect remaindermen against fraud.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, that this was a very singular Bill, for there was not a word in it alluding to the rights of the remaindermen. He thought the mistake was, that notwithstanding the promise given by his hon. Friend (Mr. Longfield) on a former occasion, that he would reconsider the objectionable clauses, they were left in precisely the same condition. Every disinterested person with whom he had conversed on the subject held, that to pass that Bill would be to open the door to unlimited fraud in Ireland; and if the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) should carry his Motion to a division, he would support him.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rather suspected that it was the intention of the authors of the Bill to proceed by degrees to the abolition of small settlements in Ireland, pursuing the principle of the Incumbered Estates Act, which he looked upon with great dislike. If the Bill were not a dangerous one, it ought to be extended to this country. He should support the Motion that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. DAWSON said, he had been opposed to the Bill at first, but on examining its provisions, and referring to high legal authorities, he felt bound to say that his opinion had changed, and that he now believed the measure would be very innocuous, which might be of use in many instances, and he should now support its general principles.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that the reason he had not re-considered the objectionable clauses was, that he had not had time since he gave his promise.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Colonel French).

Clause 1 (Explanation of Terms).

SIR EDWARD GROGAN begged to move the insertion of words, in order to confine the operation of the Bill to perpetuities, subject to annual fee-farm rents.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he could not understand the Amendment, because fee-simple properties paid no rent.

MR. GEORGE said, the object of the Amendment was quite clear and right—to confirm the operation of the Bill to perpetuities subject to yearly fee-farm rents, and not to let it apply to leases for lives or for short terms of years (two hundred) which the Bill did as it then stood.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he now understood the object of the Amendment, but the words proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Dublin (Sir Edward Grogan) did not bear the meaning intended. However, it went to the principle of the Bill, and he hoped the Committee would not agree to it.

MR. O'HAGAN said, that he had stated before that he thought the Bill would be unsatisfactory unless it were radically changed; but he believed its principle, if carefully guarded, would be innocuous, and might be to some extent beneficial, provided better protection were afforded to the interests of remaindermen.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he would support the Amendment, as erring, if erring at all, on the safe side.

Amendment negatived.

Colonel Dunne

MR. HASSARD begged to move the insertion of words extending the definition of "persons" so as to include any "bodies corporate, aggregate, or sole."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clause 2 (Enabling the Owner of the Land and the Owner of the Rent to agree for the Redemption of such Rent) agreed to.

Clause 3 (Providing for the Application of the Price of the Redemption).

MR. HASSARD begged to move the insertion of words requiring money paid for the redemption of rents to be paid "to trustees appointed by the deed or instrument whereby the estate or interest of such owner of such rent shall be limited."

MR. LONGFIELD said, he accepted the Amendment as an improvement on the measure.

Amendment agreed to, with the addition of the words, "or to be appointed, where necessary, by the Landed Estates Court."

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4, struck out. Clauses 5, 6, and 7 agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 struck out. Clauses 10 and 11 agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

PIER AND HARBOUR ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.

(In the Committee).

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Board of Trade under the General Pier and Harbour Act (1861) relating to various places enumerated.

Resolved,

That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill for confirming certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the General Pier and Harbour Act (1861), relating to Brighton, Eastbourne, Sandown, Walton-on-the-Naze, Clevedon, Rhyl, Bray, Kircubbin, Walton (Suffolk), Holywood, Exe Bight, Lytham, Ardglass, Filey, Greenock, Carlingford Lough, Wexford, Torquay, and Oban.

Resolution agreed to.

MR. CRAUFURD expressed a hope that the Orders would not be confirmed with respect to Oban, the inhabitants and authorities of which borough had received no sufficient notice of this proposal, the effect of which would be to levy a heavy tax upon them, and greatly to cripple the trade of the place, without conferring any advantage whatever upon the navigation. He begged to move that the words "and Oban" be omitted from the order.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the provisional order in question had been framed in accordance with the provisions of the General Pier and Harbour Act of 1861. No provisional order could have any force until it had been confirmed by Parliament, and it was for the purpose of having the order confirmed that a Bill was brought in.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MILNER GIBSON and Mr. HUTT.

Bill presented, and read 1<sup>o</sup>. [Bill 91.]

House resumed.

House adjourned at half after Four o'clock.

AFFAIRS OF SIAM AND TRINGANU.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India to lay upon the table of the House the following additional Correspondence on the affairs of Siam and Tringanu:—Prime Minister of Siam to Sir R. Schomburgk, September 14th, 1863; Reply, same date; Same to same, September 17th; Reply, September 19th; Ex Sultan to Prime Minister, September 28th; Prime Minister to British Consul, September 29th; Same to same, October 12th; Reply, October 13th; Prime Minister to Dutch Consul, of which copies are sent, October 12th; Replies, October 12th, 13th, and 16th; and any other Correspondence in elucidation of this matter?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied, that the whole of the documents enumerated had not reached either the Foreign Office or his Department, but he would lay on the table those which had been received.

LAND TENURE (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he considers the Tenure and Improvement of Land Act of 1860 a sufficient protection for the Irish tenant, and a sufficient inducement to the expenditure of the tenant's capital, labour, and skill in effecting improvements; and if he considers the existing Law to be deficient, either as a stimulus to increased exertion or as a protection for the enjoyment of its results, is he prepared to advise Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure either now or at a future time with a view to its amendment?

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, in reply to the somewhat novel Question of the hon. Member, that he hoped the measure referred to would have a more practical operation than it had yet had; but if he were to give an opinion upon the subject, he must also give the reasons of that opinion, and that would lead him into making a speech, which would not be in accordance with the rules of the House. In reply to the second Question, he must decline to state what advice he had given or would in future give in his official capacity to Her Majesty's Government, but that advice would be based upon a sincere desire to promote the welfare of Ireland.

RELATIONS WITH BRAZIL.

QUESTION.

MR. MACAULAY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it be true that the Brazilian Government, since his declaration made in February, that Her Majesty's Government had from the beginning accepted the proposed mediation or good offices of the King of Portugal, have now signified their acceptance; whether the King of Portugal adheres to his offer, and whether it is an offer of mediation or good offices; whether any Communication has been received by Her Majesty's Government from that of Brazil in reply to the following passage in Earl Russell's Despatch of June 6, 1863, on suspending diplomatic relations:—

"Her Majesty's Government hope that the Government of Brazil will, in its future intercourse with Great Britain, through whatever channel that intercourse may be carried on, act with that courtesy which is usual between Governments; and also that the Brazilian Government will, without further delay, frankly enter into the communication of their views as to the means by which a settlement of the long pending claims may best be arrived at."

And whether there is any objection to present to Parliament the Correspondence about British Claims on Brazil, as the Brazilian Government have laid the Correspondence before the Brazilian Legislature, and statements founded on that publication have appeared in England?

MR. LAYARD replied, that the Government had not received any official communication announcing that the Emperor of Brazil had accepted the mediation offered by the King of Portugal, but he had seen it stated in the newspapers that the Emperor of Brazil had announced his intention of accepting that mediation. The impression of the Portuguese Minister at this Court was, that a satisfactory communication would shortly be made to Her Majesty's Government on the subject. He believed the offer was one of mediation, not of good offices. Since the suspension of relations, no communication had taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Brazil, and consequently no reply had been received to the despatch of Earl Russell. He (Mr. Layard) thought it would be better not to produce any of the Correspondence at present, as there was reasonable ground for hoping that relations would be speedily resumed between the two Governments.

POOR RELIEF COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board,
Mr. Macaulay

Whether the Select Committee on Poor Relief will make a Report this Session; and, if so, whether in time for legislation on the subject; and if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring forward any measure founded thereupon during the present Session?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS, in reply, said, he was of opinion that the Select Committee on Poor Relief would make their Report very shortly, and therefore in time for legislation on the subject. With respect to what measure the Government would bring forward founded on that Report, he would, if his hon. Friend would allow him, prefer to give an answer to that Question when the Government had received that Report.

BATTERSEA PARK.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has issued any instructions to put an end to the appropriation of a part of Battersea Park as a Cricket Ground for the exclusive use of the Civil Service?

MR. COWPER said, he had been made aware, by the petitions which had been presented, that there was a feeling of jealousy among the young men who played cricket in Battersea Park on account of the regulations now in force, but the inquiries he had made justified him in asserting that there was no ground for dissatisfaction. The game would be spoilt if persons were left to pitch their wickets as they pleased. The ground at Battersea, devoted to cricketing, was divided into five portions, and in such a way as to avoid conflicts. The first and largest portion was for the use of persons not members of clubs, the second was reserved for the practice of organized clubs, a third part for the matches of organized clubs, a fourth portion was reserved for the Battersea Institution Club, and the fifth portion was allotted to the Civil Service Club. There was room for all. The ground appropriated to the use of the Civil Service Club was not at first better than the other parts of the cricket ground; if it were so now, this was owing to the expenditure of the club in mowing, rolling, and levelling it.

MR. COX said, he wished to know whether the space allotted to the Civil Service Club did not include 18,000 square yards?

MR. COWPER said, that in the space allotted to other clubs there was room to play eighteen games at a time; but in the portion granted to the Civil Service Club, which numbered 230 members, only a much smaller number of games could be played.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether Parliament will have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon any new constitution that may be proposed for the Royal Academy before Her Majesty's Government take any steps to provide increased accommodation for the Annual Exhibition and Schools of the Academy. He would further beg to ask whether, as the name of the successful competitors are affixed to their designs for the New Museum at South Kensington now exhibiting, there will be any objection to affix the names of the artists to the unsuccessful designs?

MR. COWPER, in reply, said, his noble Friend would have ample opportunity of bringing before the House the subject to which his first question referred, if he should think it necessary to do so; and, probably, the proper way of doing so would be to move an Address to the Crown. With respect to the architectural designs for the New Museum at South Kensington, he had to state that upon receiving the awards of the judges he opened the envelopes which bore the particular mottoes outside and the author's names within, and by that means he ascertained the names of the three successful competitors. He had not felt justified in opening the other envelopes, as the competitors might wish to remain anonymous. He proposed, however, to issue an advertisement inviting the competitors to signify their wishes upon that point.

LORD ELCHO said, he also wished to ask if it be the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to submit to Parliament any proposal for giving increased accommodation to the National Gallery?

MR. COWPER said, that the Government proposed to lay upon the table of the House the Estimate for building a National Gallery upon the site of Burlington House. If those Estimates were accepted, it would follow that steps must be taken for the disposal of the buildings at present occupied by the pictures belonging to the Trustees of the National Gallery.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works,

Whether the Reply of the Royal Academy to the Report of the Commission of Inquiry will be laid before the House, and whether the Report of the Trustees of the National Gallery on the proposed new National Gallery at Burlington House will be laid before the House?

MR. COWPER said, the Reply of the Royal Academy to the Report of the Commissioners would be laid before the House. With regard to the National Gallery, he was in communication with the Trustees upon the subject, and at the conclusion of the Correspondence he hoped to have the opportunity of laying before the House the opinion of the Trustees upon the design for the National Gallery.

MALICIOUS BURNINGS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government have received any report of the malicious burning on the night of the 21st instant, of the out-houses of John Kelly, of Ballinbeg, near Moate, in the county of Westmeath, whereby twelve head of cattle, and property to the value of nearly £200, were consumed; whether this John Kelly is the same party who successfully prosecuted at the Summer Assizes, 1862, in Mullingar, Patrick Eagan and the two Duigans, who were then convicted and sentenced by Chief Justice Monaghan to the heaviest punishment the law sanctioned for the crime they had committed, and who were liberated by the Lord Lieutenant before the term of their sentence had expired; and upon whose recommendation the Lord Lieutenant ordered the release of these men, and whether any reference was made to the Judge who tried them, or to the Lieutenant of the county, before such a step was taken?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, in reply, that the Government had received some report with reference to the burning of the property, not, however, of John Kelly, as stated by the hon. Member, but of Patrick Kelly. He was informed that that person had laid no information against any one, and that he was not examined at the Assizes, although he was summoned to attend. Two of the persons referred to by the hon. Member in his Question were out of the country at the time of the malicious burning, one of them having enlisted in the army, and the other having been in England for some time. Their release before the expiration of the full period of their sentence was the result of orders issued by the Lord Lieutenant, upon his own authority, and in virtue of his prerogative. In adopting this step his Excellency did not communicate with the Lieutenant of the county, but reference had been made to the Judge some time previously.

THE CASE OF MR. BEWICKE.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, On what grounds the convict Hutchinson, sentenced to four years' penal servitude for perjury, in the case of conspiracy against Mr. Bewicke, of Threepwood Hall, had been released on a ticket-of-leave, after sixteen months' imprisonment?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the hon. Member had made a slight mistake. Hutchinson had not been indicted for a conspiracy, and he was released at the end of eighteen months, and not sixteen, as stated by the hon. Member. That commutation of his sentence took place upon the express recommendation of the Judge by whom the sentence was passed. Very soon after the conviction, the learned Judge informed the Under Secretary of State that though he had deemed it to be necessary at the time of the trial to pass a severer sentence upon Hutchinson than upon the other prisoners, yet the evidence was not so conclusive in his case as it was in that of Dodd. But for some circumstances which had occurred, the Judge said he believed the jury would have taken that fact into consideration in deciding upon their verdict. There was a great difference between four years' penal servitude and the other two terms of imprisonment, in the one case twelve months, and in the other two years, and he had intended after a time to recommend a mitigation of the sentence he had passed. He subsequently expressly recommended that Hutchinson should be discharged, and, in accordance with that recommendation, he was liberated after undergoing eighteen months' imprisonment.

MR. H. BERKELEY: But was the Judge aware of the character of the man?

THE BARQUE "SCIENCE."

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can state if the case of the barque Science, of Waterford, seized on 6th November at Matamoras by a Federal war vessel, has yet been adjudicated on; and, if not, whether the British Government intend remonstrating with the United States Government on their delay in coming to a decision on the matter?

MR. LAYARD said, in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, he had to state that the case to which he alluded was, as far as Her Majesty's Government was aware, going through the ordinary stages in a Prize Court. Despatches had been received from our Consul at New Orleans saying that the inquiry was still progressing. Her Majesty's Government did not see that there was anything in the case which called for any special interference on their part.

COURTS OF JUSTICE (MONEY) BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, When the Courts of Justice (Money) Bill will be introduced by the Government?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that the Bill was not prepared at present, and he could not state when it would be ready. He believed, however, that it would be brought forward immediately after the holidays.

UNITED STATES—FORGED REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE CONFEDERATE NAVY.

EXPLANATION.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would take the opportunity of directing the attention of the House to another subject. It would be within the recollection of the House that much attention had been excited by a report from Mr. Mallory, the Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States, which was subsequently stated to be a forgery. He had received an extremely courteous communication from that gentleman, in which he stated that the document was a forgery throughout. Mr. Mallory had also requested him to make the House acquainted with his denial of the authenticity of the document.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, as a Commissioner of National Education, Whether Inspector Sheridan has ever made the Report on Convent Schools referred to in his Report laid upon the table, 6th April, 1864, by the following words, "I have it in view to inspect all the Convent Schools in my group of districts as soon as I can command sufficient time, and to make them the subject of a Special Report;" whether any orders were given to him not to make such Report; whether the revised Rules of the Board, dated the 21st November, 1863, as to Convent and Monastical Schools, have been approved of by the Lord Lieutenant; and whether care will be taken that these Rules be not acted upon until this House shall have had an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon them?

MR. O'HAGAN said, in reply, that Mr. Inspector Sheridan had made no such Report. With regard to the second Question asked by the hon. Member, he would state that no orders had been given to Mr. Inspector Sheridan by the Commissioners or any one else to prevent him from making such a Report. The Rules referred to by the hon. Member were not considered by the Commissioners or by himself to involve any fundamental change in the present system, and they had not, therefore, been submitted to the Lord Lieutenant for his sanction. His Excellency had, however, seen them. The House would have the opportunity of considering the subject, because the Rules would not come into operation until the Education Estimates had received the sanction of the House.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: I am, Sir, unwilling to embarrass Her Majesty's Government at the present time, but it does appear to me that, in the existing critical state of affairs, the House of Commons ought to be kept acquainted in general terms with the progress of the Conference; and I hope that, notwithstanding the ludicrous light in which hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to view this important Question, I may be permitted to ask, Whether it is true that the Conference has again adjourned; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will inform the House what is the reason of that adjournment, and on what day the Conference may be expected to re-assemble?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The Conference met yesterday, and has been adjourned till Monday next, but I cannot state the reason. It is the opinion of the members of the Conference that it is essential to the success of the Conference itself that their proceedings should be strictly private. It is, therefore, quite out of my power to inform the right hon. Gentleman why, on yesterday, it was adjourned till Monday.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, there was one remarkable omission in the Army Estimates, and that was as to the number of persons employed in the different establishments. Formerly that information was supplied, and as it was undesirable to lose it, he hoped the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War would follow the example of Sir George Lewis in 1862, and supply that information in a separate paper. The House had voted the sum of £119,000 as the balance of Indian disallowances. He wished to know the number of years over which the settlement ran; whether other and larger sums had not been disallowed by the Indian authorities, and, if so, out of what grants, and by what authority, those sums were paid? If the noble Marquess could not reply to that Question offhand, perhaps he would explain the facts by means of a Parliamentary paper. He wished the noble Marquess also to explain how it happened that a large sum of money which was received on account of the sale of certain public land, or land held in trust by the Crown, at Brighton, did not appear in the War Office accounts? He wished to know whether that office was not the proper department to receive and account for the same?

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, he wished to draw the attention of the House to the difference between the number of soldiers' wives now permitted to embark with a regiment for foreign service and the number permitted to reside in barracks at home. By an order issued by the late Lord Herbert on the 12th of September, 1860, the arrangements with regard to the percentage of soldiers' wives who were allowed to reside in barracks, and of those who were allowed to embark when their husbands were going abroad, were altered. The percentage in the former case was at present eight, and the percentage in the latter only six. If eight companies of a regiment were ordered on foreign service, twenty-four families were sent from head quarters to the depôt. A depôt rarely exceeded 200 men under the command of a captain; and when it was remembered that as a general rule the only means of subsistence a soldier's wife could have was by washing, the House would see that much distress must be caused by such a large accession of women and children to a military depôt. He wished to ask his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War, whether the subject had not been for a very long time under the consideration of the Government; whether there was any intention to increase the number of soldiers' wives allowed to embark with their husbands; and whether, if the Government did not intend to do that, they would reduce the number of soldiers' wives allowed to reside in barracks? It might be argued, that to increase the number of women allowed to go abroad would lead to a large increase of expense. It would do so, but the present state of things was a serious hindrance to good feeling on the part of the men; and the soldier had shown that he appreciated and deserved the efforts which of late years had been made to improve his condition. On the other hand, it would be said that to reduce the number of the women allowed to reside in barracks would be a hard measure; but it would equalize the pressure. He should, of course, prefer the former remedy, as the soldiers whose case he referred to married with the permission of their commanding officer.

LORD LOVAINE said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the undue advantage given to civilians over officers of the army by the scale of travelling expenses at present allowed by the War Office. The allowance to officers over the rank of colonel was 20*s.* a day, and to those under that rank 10*s.* a day; while to civilians in the War Office there was a uniform allowance of 16*s.*, and 4*s.* per day additional when it was necessary for them to have a servant. He begged to ask the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War, whether it was intended by Her Majesty's Government to amend those regulations with the view of removing the anomaly?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not aware that the late Sir George Lewis had, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) had stated, promised those Returns, but he saw no objection to their production, and he thought they might conveniently be furnished in the form of an Appendix to the Report. At the same time, to produce a perfectly correct Return would be impossible, owing to the fluctuating number of men employed in the different establishments from time to time. In future he expected the Vote to which the hon. Baronet referred would be presented to the House in a form which would enable hon. Members to exercise a greater control over the sum paid than they did at present. The system of double entry was being introduced as fast as possible in the manufacturing departments; and when it was in full operation the House would have the accounts at an earlier period than at present, and they would have in greater detail not only the sum proposed to be spent, but also the sort of work which it was intended to turn out during the year. In reply to the second Question, if the hon. Baronet had asked him when he was moving the supplemental estimate how the balance between the War Department and the Indian Government was arrived at, he might have been able to inform him. The papers relating to both Questions were still in his possession, and he hoped at a future day to be able to answer the inquiries of the hon. Baronet. In reply to the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Angerstein), he begged to state that it was quite true that Lord Herbert increased the number of soldiers who were allowed to marry whilst their regiments were at home, and the number of soldiers' wives allowed to live in barracks, thinking thereby to improve the condition of the soldier; but when the regiment was ordered on foreign service it became quite a different question. Not only considerable expense was incurred for the carriage of the wives and children of the soldiers, but the soldiers' wives occupied barrack room, received allowances for fuel and light, and they also drew rations. Thus considerable additional expenses were incurred. If the wives and families were taken out at all they must be lodged in barracks, because there were no other places for them. In many of the outlying stations there was a deficiency of accommodation for the soldiers themselves, and it would be almost impossible to provide accommodation for an additional number of soldiers' wives and families. Still he was ready to admit that there was great hardship in the case. The subject had been brought under the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Home Department by the Commander-in-Chief. He could only say that it was a matter which involved considerable expense, and that it was at present under the consideration of the Secretary of State. With regard to the Question of the noble Lord the Member for North Northumberland (Lord Lorraine), he begged to say that there had been many changes made in the scale of personal allowances to officers when travelling. The present allowances were 20*s.* to field officers, 10*s.* to other officers, 16*s.* to clerks, and 4*s.* to servants. Formerly all officers, when sent on duty, were allowed 15*s.* a day, and civilians employed in the War Department 20*s.* The subject of allowances was under consideration with a view to bring them under a more comprehensive rule. It was admitted that 10*s.* a day did not cover the travelling expenses of officers, and he thought that the allowance should be in accordance with the position of the parties. He believed that 16*s.* was allowed to clerks because it was not expected that they would have to travel about, while officers on the other hand never expected to be kept in one place. It was proposed to make some further change, which would give a more satisfactory personal allowance to field officers travelling on Her Majesty's service. The subject was under consideration, and he hoped that some satisfactory arrangement would be arrived at.

SUPPLY.

(1.) £262,216, Army Medical Establishment, Services and Supplies.

COLONEL NORTH said there could be no doubt whatever that the medical service of the army was under-handed. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Sir Richard Airey, and other officers of distinction, had given evidence to that effect before the Committee of 1856. The Commander-in-Chief said that in time of peace every regiment should have one surgeon and two assistant surgeons, and in time of war one surgeon and three assistant surgeons. At present there were 200 vacancies in the army, and only fourteen persons presented themselves for examination to fill those vacancies. The age of entrance for the candidates was in consequence raised from twenty-five to thirty years, and yet only six persons presented themselves for examination on the next occasion. During the last few weeks the War Office issued an advertisement to the effect that they would accept applications from any qualified surgeons under forty years of age. That was surely a most unsatisfactory state of things, which could only be accounted for by the unpopularity of the service. He believed that the medical officers of the army deserved better treatment. Lord de Roos, Sir Richard Airey, and other officers bore the strongest testimony to the zeal, ability, and energy of the medical officers during the Crimean war. Sir A. Smith had been most unfairly treated on account of the state of the medical department during that war. But the fact was that during forty years of peace the medical department had become under-handed in consequence of a false economy, and hence arose the inefficiency which was manifested during the Crimean war. He received letters from young medical men blaming Dr. Gibson, the Director General of the Medical Department. But he did not think Dr. Gibson was to blame. They were told that the Channel fleet was in the Downs, and they did not know from hour to hour whether they might not be at war. Yet the medical department of the army was in such a state that no gentlemen of ability in their profession wished to join the service. It was right that the country should know the state in which the medical department of the army was, so that in case of any deficiency of medical assistance the country should not blame the Director General, but the Government which allowed the department to be in such a disgraceful state. It was impossible for us to know how soon we might be plunged into war; and it was manifestly most undesirable that any insuperable difficulty should exist to our supplying our regiments with the requisite number of medical officers.

GENERAL PEELE said, that if the statement made by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) were correct—namely, that there were at present 200 vacancies in the medical department of the army, and that very few applicants presented themselves to fill them, it was a subject for very serious consideration. In the year 1858, when he was Secretary for War, one of his first actions had been to issue a medical warrant in conformity with the express recommendation of the Army Sanitary Committee, by which a higher position was to have been secured to medical officers; and he had been told by Sir Benjamin Brodie and Sir James Clark that that warrant had afforded so much satisfaction, that it had induced the best class of students to present themselves for admission into the medical service of the army. But great complaints had since been made by the medical officers that faith had not been kept with them; and it appeared that the arrangements with respect to relative rank, though conceded by the Horse Guards and the War Office, had been set aside, and set aside, as he understood, principally because the Admiralty had found it difficult to extend a similar rule to their profession. The result was that a sufficient number of candidates for admission into that branch of the service could no longer be found. He should be glad to receive some explanation from the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War upon that point, and to hear why the recommendation of the Sanitary Committee had not in that case been carried into effect. It was of great importance that the army should be supplied with first-class surgeons, and that a sufficient number of candidates should present themselves for that service. It appeared it was not even now necessary that they should pass a competitive examination, and that it was sufficient if they passed a qualifying one. He went with a deputation to the late Sir George Lewis on that subject. A Committee was appointed by the War Office, and that Committee reported entirely in favour of the medical officers. He hoped the noble Lord would be able to give a satisfactory explanation of the subject.

MAJOR O'REILLY begged to express his satisfaction at hearing the observations which had fallen from the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel). He could bear testimony from experience to the favourable light in which the warrant of 1858 was regarded by medical officers, and to the fact that the changes which had been made in it were most injurious to the efficiency of the service. Before sitting down, he was anxious to correct some errors which he had committed in a comparison that he made on a former occasion between the cost of British and French soldiers—errors to which his attention had been called by the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon, and which were shared with him by the War Office. In the first place, he had forgotten to take into account the 1,500 native troops which were serving in China and Labuan. These troops could not be added to the number of the English army, as suggested by the gallant General, because they were not properly British troops, but were Indian troops, borrowed by England for the time. Making the necessary correction on this account, by deducting the cost of their pay and clothing from these items respectively, the cost per man for pay would be reduced from £41 15s., at which he stated it, to £41 9s.; and for clothing from £4 6s. to £4 5s. He had also overlooked the capitation rate of £10 a man which was paid for the troops in India, amounting in the whole to £726,000. This sum must be deducted from the total charge of the army, and would diminish the cost of each man by 5½ per cent. The right hon. and gallant Member had mentioned as another error that he did not take into account the circumstance that the Votes for manufactures and stores included guns and other things which were made for the navy. The fact was that he did call attention to that circumstance, but his remarks upon that subject were not reported. The proceedings in that House were reported with wonderful accuracy and intelligence, but it was impossible to report everything that was said. He did call attention to the fact that those two Votes included guns supplied to the navy, but that, on the other hand, the votes for the navy included cost of transport for the army, and that the late Sir George Lewis had stated that after a careful examination he had come to the conclusion that about £300,000 was about the balance due from the navy to the army; and, therefore, he had deducted £2 per man from the cost of manufactures and stores. It ought to be remembered that he was comparing the cost of the British with that of the French soldier, and as the French estimate included artillery for the navy, that error, if error it was, appeared on both sides of the account. The next error mentioned was that the Votes for manufactures, stores, and for administration, applied not merely to the army of 147,000 men, but also to the Reserve Force, Militia, Volunteers, &c.

General Peel

He did not take that circumstance into consideration, because he was comparing the cost of the two services, and there was no European army the charge for which did not include the expense of reserves, which were not expressly provided for. The question was, whether the French reserves affected the French Votes to the same or nearly the same extent as our reserves affected the Votes of that House. Our reserves consisted of the Army Reserve, a force of about 1,500 men; the effective militia, which numbered last year about 100,000; and the Volunteers, who formed a reserve most effective for purposes of defence, but entailed a very limited cost directly upon the administration or the stores of the army. The French reserves were between 60,000 and 70,000 men, who were borne on the strength of their regiments, who were effective soldiers, ready at any moment to fall into the ranks, but who were on furlough and drawing no pay; and a reserve of conscripts, the number of which could not be precisely ascertained, but which might possibly amount to 300,000. Those men received three months' training the first year, two months the second, and one the third, which was fully equivalent to the training of our militia. He had left the reserves out of view, after mature consideration; because those of each service would equally affect the general cost of the army.

GENERAL PEELE said, that he should be sorry that it should go forth to the public upon the authority of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Major O'Reilly), who had evidently paid so much attention to the subject, confirmed to his surprise by the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War, that the cost of the British soldier was £92 7s. 6d. per annum, while that of the French soldier was only £43. That was an entirely fallacious calculation, founded upon an erroneous basis. The hon. and gallant Member said, that the recruiting of the British soldier cost 14s. per man, and he arrived at that result by dividing the total expenditure upon recruiting by 146,000, the number of men voted for the present year. But the fact was, that in that sum was included the cost of recruiting for the whole Indian army, and therefore it ought to have been divided, not by 146,000, but by 220,000. The charge for gunpowder was for gunpowder supplied to the navy, militia, and Volunteers, as well as to the army, and therefore deductions ought to have been made on those accounts. The 1,500 troops of the Indian army to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred, so far from being cheaper, were much dearer than others, because so long as they were in China it was necessary to give Indian pay and allowances to all the troops who were employed in that part of the world. The fact was that the method of arriving at the cost of each soldier by dividing the sum voted by the number of men was completely erroneous. If the army was reduced to 50,000 to-morrow, which he was afraid was very unlikely to be the case, the non-effective Vote alone would make each man cost more than the French soldier; while if the number of men was reduced to 10,000, that Vote would make them cost £210 each. If the noble Lord reduced the army by a regiment 1,000 strong, he would not save £92,000, which would be the case if those calculations were sound, but only about £42,000. He was extremely sorry it should have gone forth to the country on the authority of the hon. and gallant Member, that there was such a great difference between the cost of the British and French soldier. An hon. Member not in the habit of framing Army Estimates might be excused from falling into such a mistake, but how the representatives of the War Office, upon whom the preparation of those Estimates devolved, could have endorsed the error, and stated, as the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War had stated, that but little difference existed between his figures and those of the hon. and gallant Member, he was at a loss to understand. The real question, however, was not as to the comparative cost of the French and English soldier; whether any portion of the annual charge could be diminished was an inquiry much more relevant. He had placed in the hands of the hon. and gallant Member Returns of the cost of clothing during the five years for which he was responsible, and he thought it was only at the rate of about £2 per man. It was utterly impossible to draw any comparison as to the costs of the services in England and in France from the details given in the Estimates. The calculation of £92 as the cost of the British soldier was based on entirely erroneous data, and he hoped the noble Marquess would state upon what grounds the authorities at the War Office came to entertain that idea.

COLONEL SYKES rose to address the House—

COLONEL NORTH: I rise to order. I beg to suggest that it will be more regular to finish the discussion on Vote 7.

MR. MASSEY said, he had not interrupted the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Major O'Reilly) who wished to rectify a former mis-statement; but his explanation having been made and commented upon by the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), he trusted the Committee would now revert to the original subject under consideration.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he hoped that the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War would give some information on the subject of a question he had put to him some time since, relative to the evil in a medical and moral point of view incident to the collection of troops in garrison towns. He could not help thinking that the medical charges could be considerably reduced by proper arrangements. It was a subject which deserved consideration in the interest of the soldier and of the public. Infectious diseases might often be prevented as well as cured, and he believed that great social as well as physical benefits might be looked for from such an inquiry. The subject to which he referred had been treated at some length in The Times a few weeks ago.

COLONEL SYKES said, that on comparing the cost of medical men, medicines, Hospital Corps, and other necessary appliances for maintaining the health of the army, he found that in England it was at the rate of £1 11s. 7d., while in France it was £1 10s. 8d. He believed that to contrast the total numbers with the total medical charges of the army was the only method of arriving at a sound and just result.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that the question raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) was one of vital importance. Nobody who had read the Reports of the army and navy, or those which had been published respecting our Mediterranean and Indian stations, could fail to be struck with the number of men invalided during their term of service, or prematurely thrown as pensioners upon the country. The question was one too objectionable in its character for any private Member to take up, but it was the bounden duty of the Government to institute measures of a remedial character, and if, in addition to the Reports in their possession, they wished to strengthen themselves by the opinions of a Committee or Commission, the House, he thought, would gladly afford the requisite facilities.

COLONEL DUNNE begged to express his approval of the good sense shown by the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) in introducing the subject. The matter was one which it was impossible to debate in the House, and yet every man knowing anything of the military and naval services was aware that it lay at the root of their health and efficiency. He was anxious to obtain some information with regard to the purveyor's department, the Vote for which seemed to be much larger than was necessary, and the duties of which, he was informed, could be divided between the medical staff, the storekeeper, and the barrack masters. He felt persuaded that in many of the innumerable departments, which were always on the increase, considerable reductions could be made without impairing the general efficiency of the service. The proper method was to compel the departments to originate their own reforms; they knew where retrenchments could be made without impropriety, while the House of Commons could only criticize expenditure without laying its finger on the excess.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) had called the attention of the Committee to the deficiency in the supply of surgeons for the army, but had attributed that circumstance to the wrong cause.

COLONEL NORTH observed, that he had not assigned any reasons, not knowing what the reasons were.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied that either the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) or the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) sitting below him had connected the deficiency of surgeons with the failure to carry out in their integrity the recommendations of the Commission on which the warrant was founded. In all essential particulars those recommendations had been complied with, and the medical officers had obtained every substantial advantage contemplated by those recommendations. In one or two points they had been departed from, but they were hardly of a character to deter any medical man, otherwise desirous of doing so, from entering the service. It was perfectly true that in consequence of objections raised by regimental officers acquiesced in by the Horse Guards, and sanctioned by the late Lord Herbert, medical officers, although enjoying the relative rank laid down for them in the warrant, were not to act as Presidents of Boards of Survey or other Boards when one of their number happened to be the senior officer present; but he could not imagine that such comparative trifles would make any medical man hold back who intended to connect himself professionally with the army. The difficulty of obtaining medical officers might in part be accounted for by the fact that, in spite of the increase of population in the United Kingdom, there was, if anything, for the last few years a diminution in the number of men educated for the medical profession. The great steamboat companies, railways, mining and other private undertakings likewise entered into competition with the Government, and offered to medical men more immediate advantages, as well as the prospect of a more speedy rise in the world than could be hoped for in the army. He was afraid that if, within the next few years, the demand which had sprung up in this country for members of the medical profession should not be met by an increased supply, Her Majesty's Government would have to consider the expediency of offering increased advantages, not in the way of additional rank, but of increased pay. He assured the House that the subject had by no means escaped attention. Within the last few days the noble Earl (the Secretary for War) had consulted, not only the Director General and others, but likewise medical men unconnected with the army. He was not in a position to state the nature of their recommendations, but he could assure the Committee that the subject had not escaped attention, and that measures would be promptly taken to keep up the necessary supply of medical men. The subject adverted to by his hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) was one of great importance, but it affected the navy as well as the army, and ought not to be partially dealt with. It had received the consideration both of his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Clarence Paget) and himself, and later in the Session it was his noble Friend's intention to propose the appointment either of a Committee or Commission to inquire into the question. In reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Queen's County

(Colonel Dunne), he would state that he was not aware of any extravagance in the Vote for the purveying service. That service used to be performed partly by the purveyors and partly by the commissariat, but the system was not found to answer during the Crimean war, and the present service was adopted on the recommendation of the Sanitary Commission. If the hon. and gallant Member would look at the Estimates he would see that a reduction had taken place in that portion of the Vote which was susceptible of reduction. The medical items were in excess of last year, but that was on account of the New Zealand war. The items for the purchase and repair of hospital stores and hospital bedding, which were directly under the control of the purveyor-in-chief, had been reduced by economical management, and further reductions would be made. After what had been said by the Chairman, he was unwilling to enter upon a comparison between the cost of the French and English soldier. He could assure the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) that the War Office had not arrived at the amount of £92 by simply dividing the number of men by the Vote for the army. Everything that could be fairly taken out had been withdrawn from the estimate, and he could by no means concur with the right hon. and gallant Member that the cost of our infantry soldiers was only £45 per man. He was aware that the cost could be reduced by raising the number of men. If the number of the army was increased by 35,000 troops, and the strength of regiments was raised to 1,000 men each, the expenditure would only be increased by £1,000,000, and the relative cost would be reduced from £92 to £78 per man. The English soldier received more than the French soldier. The War Office gave him boots, but the French Government did not. Taking the average cost of the soldier, it was not at all an unfair statement to say, that the English soldier cost the country £90 in one way and another. The fixed charges, the expenses in barracks, and other items of the kind, had much more effect in raising the apparent cost per man in our small army than in the larger army of France. When the Committee came to the Store Vote he should show that a great portion of this expense ought not to be attributed to the army alone, but that a very large sum ought to be spread over the auxiliary services. In regard to the non-effective Vote, he would make the right hon. and gallant Member a present of it altogether. The non-effective Vote in the French army was £8 as against £15 in the English; but leaving that out, the proportion was not altered. Leaving the non-effective service out of the question in both armies, the charge would be £37 18s. 10d. in the French, against £76 17s. 2d. in the English service. That, however, would not affect the relative proportion. With the exception of recruiting, he believed that no sum had been charged in the War Office estimate that could not be fairly included in calculating the cost of the English soldier. He could not, therefore, admit that either his hon. Friend or himself had been so much in error as the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) appeared to think.

COLONEL NORTH said, that officers in the medical service did not so much complain of the question of rank; but that of late years they had not been allowed to retire till after twenty-five years' service. What they wanted was the permission to retire after twenty years' service, an arrangement which would give them a much better chance of obtaining a good private practice. The country had a right to expect that when its troops were prostrated by wounds or unhealthy climates they would have the best possible medical advice. At present there were no less than 200 vacancies in the medical department. During the Crimean war there was scarcely a family in the country, from the peer to the peasant, that did not mourn the loss of some relative. A Committee was appointed in 1856, which reported that the medical officers had been deficient during the war. Eight years had elapsed, and the same state of things existed. If war broke out to-morrow, what would the troops do for surgeons? The Committee which sat eight years ago reported that each regiment in the service should have a surgeon and two assistant surgeons; but at present the regiments serving at home had no assistant surgeons at all. The authorities were obliged to send assistant surgeons out to India who had only just returned from Canada, New Zealand, or the West Indies. A class of acting assistant surgeons had been appointed who had never before been heard of in this country, and some of the regiments had no assistant surgeons. The country had a right to expect that the medical department of the army should be placed in the best possible position.

The Marquess of Hartington

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War, whether he was aware that the Commanders-in-Chief at Madras and Bombay had issued a circular inviting medical officers of Her Majesty's army to take charge of the new regiments in India? He thought it would be much better if they employed the medical officers of the old East Indian army, who from long experience were better acquainted with the diseases incident to the climate. He wanted to know whether a calculation was made that a certain number of men would be in hospital during the year, and that a certain amount of medicine and necessaries for diet would be required; or did the War Department go upon chance? In the French army the calculation was made upon the fixed basis that one man in twenty-five, or 4 per cent, was always in hospital.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the calculation was based upon former experience. It was known that last year, the year before, and for some years past, a certain number of men were in hospital, and an average was thus arrived at.

COLONEL SYKES: What is it?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not know.

(2.) £783,783, Disembodied Militia.

COLONEL DUNNE begged to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that, while in the line they were lowering the standard, and found it extremely difficult to get recruits, they experienced no difficulty in obtaining men for the militia. It was, however, very hard to find officers. Out of 4,500 officers, which did not really represent the proper number of the establishment, more than 1,500 were at present wanted, while they had the whole of the men, with the exception of some 10,000, who could be easily had. He attributed that state of things to the officers being put to such heavy expenses, particularly for lodgings, when their regiments were out training. That was the result of a bad economy. Another instance of the miserable economy which was carried to almost an absurd length, was to be found in the fact, that while the training of his own regiment would cost £2,000, he had over and over again applied to the War Department for ground for training, and though the expense would be only about £50, he could not get it allowed. The ground they had at present was so small that he could not deploy the regiment, and he was obliged to double the companies.

COLONEL NORTH said, he must complain of the hardship inflicted on mounted officers of the militia in not being allowed forage all the year round. They merely got the allowance of 2s. a day, the same as those officers who were allowed charges all through the year.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, the difficulty of finding officers to fill the junior ranks in the militia was owing to the want of proper accommodation for them when billeted in small towns. The subject was one which deserved the attention of the War Office.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the question of allowances for lodgings to officers of the militia had in a very few instances been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State. In most places where militia regiments were sent for training there was proper accommodation in billets, to which the officers were entitled, and for lodgings; and in cases where it was shown to the satisfaction of the inspecting officer that the quarters on which the officers were billeted were not available, an allowance for lodgings had been granted. A similar observation would apply to the case of drilling-ground. The allowance for the hire of drilling-ground was in most instances found sufficient, and where it was not, the remaining sum was required to be paid out of the Contingent Fund. But that was not a hardship. With respect to field officers receiving a larger share of forage allowance, that was scarcely necessary, because those officers were generally gentlemen, and in a position to keep their own horses independently of any allowance. There was one point to which he was anxious to call attention, and he could wish that the discussion upon it would come on at a time when a large number of militia officers were present, because the Secretary of State would be glad to know their opinion upon it. Although the militia force was in a highly satisfactory state, still there was a general opinion amongst the officers that it would greatly increase the efficiency of the force if a longer period for training were allowed. Four weeks instead of three would be productive of great benefit in the training of the men. It was evident that any prolongation of the period of training would be attended with a large increase of expense. It had been calculated that a week's more training to the whole of the militia force, recruits included, would increase the cost by £65,000; and, exclusive of recruits, by something over £50,000. It had been considered, and the idea had met with the approval of some militia officers, that it would tend to the general efficiency of the force while in an embodied state, that the numbers of the very large regiments should be reduced, while the smaller regiments were kept at their present amount. Some regiments numbered twelve companies and 1,200 privates. The Government did not propose to reduce or meddle with the staff of such regiments, and the number of the companies would remain the same, the only difference contemplated being that the commanding officers should be requested not to raise the numbers of their regiments, when in a disembodied state, beyond 800 or 900 men. The regiments of 1,000 men would be reduced in proportion. He believed that a great many commanding officers agreed in thinking that it was impossible for any staff or commanding officer to drill properly a regiment 1,200 men strong. Supposing that proposal met with the general approval of the officers of the militia force (for Lord De Grey did not desire to do anything not generally approved), it was estimated that the saving effected thereby in another year would probably be sufficient, without materially increasing the Vote, to give an extra week's training to the men. It was well worthy of the consideration of militia officers whether the adoption of such a measure would not tend to the efficiency of their regiments.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he had no doubt the proposition would generally meet with the approval of militia officers who commanded large regiments. He thought there were not at present more than six or seven regiments in Ireland that at all came up to 1,000 men each, and not above five or six in England over 1,000 men. He considered between 800 and 900 men sufficient for a militia regiment. Such a regiment was infinitely more handy to drill than one composed of a larger number.

(3.) £47,886, Yeomanry, agreed to.

(4.) £39,200, Yeomanry Cavalry.

MR. LAWSON said, he rose to oppose the Vote which had come before the House under very peculiar circumstances. Hon. Members who sat on the Ministerial side of the House would remember that on the 3rd of March last they received a circular in which they were earnestly and particularly requested to come down to the House and take part in the Yeomanry Cavalry Vote that was to come before the Committee. They accordingly came down and heard the able speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley (Colonel Edwards), that of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and also that of the noble Marquess the Under Secretary of State for War, as well as those of several hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. They were convinced by the speech of the two noble Lords, and a Motion was carried that the Yeomanry should not be called out this year. About a week afterwards he read the following paragraph in The Times newspaper:—

"The Yeomanry Cavalry.—A numerous deputation of Yeomanry Cavalry officers had an interview with Lord Palmerston at Cambridge House, on Wednesday morning, for the purpose of urging upon the noble Lord the desirability of calling out that force for active service during the present year. The Premier, after listening to their statements, said, that since the last Vote in the House of Commons upon Colonel Edwards' Motion, the Government had carefully considered the subject. Within the last few days advices had been received from New Zealand, which were so favourable that the Government would be enabled to effect a saving upon the Estimates and incur the expense of training of the Yeomanry without any addition to the gross amount. He had great pleasure, therefore, in informing the deputation that the force would be called out as usual this year. The noble Viscount also complimented the Yeomanry Cavalry upon their high state of efficiency, and the value of their services whenever they had been required, and expressed an unqualified opinion that they were a necessary auxiliary to the new Rifle Volunteer force."

He had heard a great many extraordinary arguments for increasing our military force, which had great weight in that House, but the most extraordinary one of all was that because we were at peace, therefore we were to increase our warlike expenditure. Hon. Members who, like himself, sat below the gangway, were often accused of making speeches on questions of high policy, and of bringing forward abstract Resolutions in favour of economy, and of doing nothing practical, and neglecting to watch the Estimates. He thought there was a great deal of truth in the charge. Here, then, was a case in which they ought to oppose the Vote, for the expenditure had been declared by the Prime Minister and the Under Secretary for War to be unnecessary; and because he denied the statement, which had been made on a previous occasion, that the

Mr. Lawson

Yeomanry force was necessary to keep the manufacturing districts in order. It was a small sum, it was true; but they were often told they ought to be particular and saving in small matters; and because he wished to obey the injunctions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and practise economy, and because Her Majesty's Government were well able to defend the country without that force, he should oppose the Vote.

MR. NEATE said, the Committee had just reduced the Army Hospital Vote by £2,000—a Vote which involved the medical comforts of the soldier, and concurrently with it they were about to expend this large sum of money in a very useless manner.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he had always consistently opposed the Yeomanry Cavalry Vote from a belief that it was a very expensive force, and because he considered the money was misapplied. He could not leave the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson) alone in his glory, and, therefore, he rose to oppose the Vote. He had never seen a finer body of men than our Yeomanry except in the position of soldiers. He considered it a force kept up entirely for the amusement of the aristocracy and the landowners. They very much liked to get upon horses in fine uniforms, but they were careless of the work they had to do, for they did not take the pains to make their men good soldiers. He thought it was setting a bad example to the Volunteers, when they expended so much on the Yeomanry Cavalry, and did nothing for the former. That was treatment which our auxiliary force ought not to receive. He would have the military force of the country kept up in the best way possible, and if they did that, and accepted with gratitude the assistance of the Volunteers, they would be quite able to dispense with the services of the Yeomanry. If the Yeomanry would make themselves equal to the Volunteers he would stand by them, but before they would be equal to that position they must give more attention to discipline and drill.

COLONEL KNOX said, he could not allow the observations of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) to pass unnoticed. He quite concurred in the opinion that the Volunteers were an admirable force, and that they had done great service to the country; but the hon. Member had made a mistake in saying they cost the country nothing. They cost about £300,000 annually.

MR. H. BERKELEY: And very cheap at the money.

COLONEL KNOX said, that was very likely, but denied that the Yeomanry Cavalry were by no means an inefficient body, and he referred the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) to the Report of the Commission, which showed the contrary.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) need not be under any apprehension that the reduction on the Hospital Vote would at all interfere with the hospital comforts of the men. The reduction had been made, not in hospital comforts, but in the number of the staff, as it was now anticipated less would be required than when the Estimates were formed. With regard to the Vote now before the Committee, he had nothing more to say on the subject than when it was last before the House, when he gave his vote in an opposite direction to what he should to-night. He and the noble Lord at the head of the Government admitted that exercise and frequent training were necessary to keep up the efficiency of the Yeomanry Cavalry, but they said they were unable to make a grant towards the force this year, because the Estimates had been swelled beyond their ordinary amount by exceptional circumstances, and it was considered that a large outlay would be necessary for the war in New Zealand. Some time afterwards news was received in this country that it was anticipated the war would be over much sooner than it was anticipated when the Estimates were framed, and, therefore, the necessity for the reduction of the Vote and the reasons given for it no longer existed. He hoped, therefore, although it was disagreeable to ask hon. Members to vote in an opposite direction to what they had done, that under the altered state of things they would do so and agree to the Vote. News had been received that day from New Zealand of an equally if not more favourable character, and, therefore, he thought they might with propriety agree to the Vote.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was sorry the Government had placed that Vote in the Estimates after it had been withdrawn. The army had many auxiliary forces, but the only one in which the country placed no confidence, was that of the Yeomanry. It was a force kept up as a plaything for country gentlemen and others.

CORONEL EDWARDS said, he was not aware whether the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) had ever seen a Yeomanry Cavalry regiment or not, but it struck him very forcibly that the hon. Member knew but very little about the matter, as he had given expression to an opinion which no other person under such circumstances would have given. He could, however, guess, from the feeling of the Committee, that the Vote would be agreed to by a large majority. He wished also to inform the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Berkeley) that he was also wrong in his estimate of the services of the Yeomanry Cavalry and the state of their drill. The regiment to which he belonged commenced their drill a fortnight ago, and from that time till August, the whole regiment would be out at least twice a week on foot, and five or six times mounted, for which they would never receive a single shilling. He mentioned that fact because he was sorry to find that a wrong impression existed with regard to the force. He could not understand what object the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson) could have in view in bringing the question forward, unless it was to embarrass the Government of which he was a supporter. When he brought forward his Motion on the occasion referred to, the opinion of the House was so evenly divided upon the question, that it was only lost by a majority of one, which, no doubt, happened because there were five instead of four Under Secretaries in the House. If they had had only the proper number it would have been a tie, when, no doubt, the Chairman, who was alive to the advantages of our having a good and efficient Yeomanry Cavalry force, would have voted for the Motion.

Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £39,200, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of the Yeomanry Cavalry, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, inclusive."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 119; Noes 29: Majority 90.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £328,260, Volunteers.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH begged to ask what the intentions of the Government were with respect to clothing the Volunteers. The force had now passed out of its experimental state, and had become one of the institutions of the country. Was it, then, reasonable to suppose that a body of 160,000 men, on which the safety of the country in a great measure depended, could go on by their individual subscriptions making up in great part the maintenance of the force, particularly with regard to clothing? A million and a half of money was subscribed by the public when the movement was initiated, in aid of the preliminary expenses, but they could not now expect a repetition of that liberality. The clothes were now, however, nearly worn out, and, in his opinion, some assistance should be given towards their renewal. The metropolitan regiments were spirited and opulent enough to provide their own clothing and equipments, but the provincial corps consisted mainly of working men, and it was too much to ask them, year after year, to supply their own uniforms. He feared that if something of the kind were not done there would be a great falling off in the force. There was a great difference in the treatment of the Yeomanry Cavalry and the treatment of the Volunteers; for while the latter were only voted £1 10s. per head, the Yeomanry were voted £7 per head, and it could not be said that the Volunteers were less important to the country than the Yeomanry. Some suggestion was thrown out by the predecessor in office of the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War, to the effect that facilities should be offered to the Volunteers for obtaining their clothing at cost price, or some similar arrangement. He would be glad to receive some information on the subject.

LORD ELCHO said, he fully appreciated the kind feelings towards the Volunteer force which had induced the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith) to bring the matter forward; still he thought it was hardly necessary that the country should be put to the expense indicated in his remarks. The country had dealt liberally with the Volunteers, and he believed that the grant of £1. and in other cases £1 10s. per man, would be sufficient with good management to meet the requirements of the force, and to assist the men with regard to their clothing, by spreading the charge over a number of years.

COLONEL SYKES said, he feared that unless some assistance were given to the men to enable them to supply themselves with their present, or with some cheaper uniform, some diminution would take place in the strength of the force. The capitulation grant of 20s. or 30s., as the case might be, did not go to the men themselves, but was drawn by the adjutant, and was applied on his responsibility. The Volunteer staffs cost £160,129 out of the £328,260. In a small regiment the erection of a butt alone would absorb half the allowance from the Government. There were various other expenses for head-quarters, conveyance to reviews, and the like, which at the end of the year left nothing available for clothing. He did not invite the House to vote more money for those corps, but he thought it right to warn it of the present state of things.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he had commanded a Volunteer battalion since the commencement of the movement, and had made the best calculations he could in regard to its expenses, and his conviction was that the allowance now proposed would be sufficient with good management to meet almost every outlay connected with the corps, including clothing. Of course, it would not do so in the first year; but, taking an average of several years, he had no doubt the allowance would suffice. New clothing would not be required until next year when they would have three years money in hand. The Volunteer corps received great assistance from the services of the adjutants; and he did not think any portion of the Vote was better spent than that which went to the adjutants. Good drill sergeants were also an absolute necessity.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER begged to point out to the Committee that a great difficulty arose in many cases where the men had to travel a considerable distance for battalion drill. That was a source of pecuniary pressure on country corps, and ought to be taken into consideration by the Government. Members of his own regiment had to travel forty, fifty, and even sixty miles for that purpose.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he believed that, in the event of emergency, men as capable of commanding large bodies of troops would arise among the Volunteers as were to be found in any other force in the country. He should be sorry if, through any pecuniary pressure, any diminution in the number of that valuable force should take place. He feared, however, that unless some help were given in the matter of clothing, many of our most valuable Volunteer corps would melt away.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he believed the sum allowed by the Government, if expended by commanding officers with economy, and with proper regard to the well-being of their corps, would be found sufficient to find clothing for the men, not at once, perhaps, but, at all events, by degrees. He thought that the Volunteers as Volunteers should not ask for more. The force was regarded with greater pride by the country, because they devoted the requisite time to the service, and all they wanted was that the extra money out of pocket should be re-paid to them.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he was quite sure the feeling of the corps he commanded, which consisted very largely of working men, and the feeling of the Volunteers generally, was that the House and country had dealt most liberally with them, and they excessively disliked the idea of coming begging to Parliament. It might be true that Volunteers in the country had greater distances to go to drill, but they could obtain head-quarters and ranges at a much cheaper rate than the metropolitan corps. He thought the Royal Commission had made a very proper recommendation; and, in his opinion, the allowance made would, with due economy, enable every regiment to re-clothe and maintain itself.

MR. HUMBERSTON said, that the allowance from the Government was extremely handsome, and as it depended upon the members of each corps whether they received the full amount, they had no right to complain if they had not sufficient funds through members not qualifying. Still he feared that those regiments which had to re-clothe themselves this year might have some difficulty in meeting that cost and providing for ordinary expenses. The corps to which he belonged had to re-clothe this year, and they would be deficient by a very considerable sum. Still he made no complaint; that would be contrary to the wishes of the corps. He was certain the Volunteers did not wish for the extraneous aids of balls and bazaars which were very objectionable. He did not ask for anything at the present moment, but he thought an allowance should be made to pay current expenses, and to provide clothing for those men who did not clothe themselves.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was very much gratified by the very moderate requirements of the Volunteers. They were a most efficient and useful force, and the greatest possible credit was due to their commanding officers for being satisfied with the sum which had been granted. He hoped the time would never arrive when the House of Commons would make any objection to the continuance of such an allowance as might be necessary to maintain the efficiency of the force.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON observed, that the Government did what the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith) suggested they should do—they gave certain kinds of cloth, five, six, or more patterns, at cost price. He could not say it was intended to take any further steps in the way of assisting the Volunteer force, either by increasing the capitation allowance or providing them with clothing. The Commission to which the hon. Gentleman referred sat two years ago, and one of the principal difficulties to which they addressed themselves had reference to re-clothing. That question was very minutely gone into; they had it fully before them when they made their report, and it was clear from what had fallen from the commanders of corps to-night that the general feeling of the Volunteers was that the country had behaved liberally to them, and that they did not desire any further grant at all events without a more extended trial of the present arrangement. No doubt some difficulty was experienced in attending battalion drill, but with respect to administrative battalions, there was an allowance of 4s. per man where they had to travel over a certain distance to attend drill over and beyond the 20s. or 30s. a year for each effective man. The Order in Council which was issued last year changed the denomination from "effective" to "efficient," and laid down a new standard of efficiency. In August, 1862, the total number of Volunteers enrolled was 157,818; on the 1st of December, 1863, the number was 161,939, which was an increase. On the 1st of August, 1862, the number of effectives under the old system was 131,420; and on the 1st of December, 1863, the number of efficient under the new system was reduced to 112,499. That showed that the new standard laid down by the Order in Council had the effect desired, that it was really a standard of efficiency, and that a good many who were formerly regarded as effective were not really efficient Volunteers. No doubt, in a very short time, when the requirements of the Order in Council were better understood, the number of efficient would more nearly approach the number of men enrolled.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he did not think any sufficient answer had been given to the statements he had made. It was all very well for the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Biche), to whom the force was so largely indebted, to say the Volunteer force was satisfied with the present arrangements. It might be so with the gallant Caledonians in London, who were able to provide their own uniform; but the case was very different in those localities where the men were in an inferior condition of life. He thought clothing should be provided for the Volunteers. He repeated that the present allowance only paid the current expenses, and in country localities the expense was found to be a heavy burden upon the men. Clothing could not be provided for less than £1 a year, and at the highest estimate that only left 10s. per man for the ordinary expenses of the regiment. At all events the working classes corps ought to derive more assistance than they now did.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he believed that the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley) had not drawn the necessary distinction between the consolidated and the administrative corps.

(6.) £49,580, Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve.

GENERAL PEELE begged to ask for some information respecting the Army Reserve Force—where it was to be found, and of what it consisted. It would appear from the increase of the Vote from £7,000 to £10,000, that the number of men had increased. Was that the fact?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the number of the Army Reserve was 216 in Ireland and 1,405 in Great Britain, making a total of 1,621. The force consisted of men who had taken their discharge from the army at the completion of ten years' service, and they were entitled by serving double the number of years in the army reserve that they would have had to serve in the army to the same allowance that they would have received in the latter case. He admitted that the Army Reserve Force had not fulfilled the expectations that had been formed of it. The reason was that officers commanding regiments had not given any encouragement to it. They naturally wished to discourage their men from taking their discharges, and, therefore, in order to induce them to re-enlist, the commanding officers did not take any trouble to publish the conditions of service in the Army Reserve. If when officers found the men were determined to take their discharge from the army they were to explain the advantages of joining the Reserve, the force would soon assume a different aspect.

GENERAL PEELE wished to be informed whether those men were ever exercised or called out for training. He thought it would be better when it was found that a ten years' man would not re-enlist that he should be recommended to join the militia, in order to prevent that small body of men being scattered all over the three kingdoms.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he doubted whether commanding officers would not be as unwilling to encourage enlistment in the militia as to join the Army Reserve, but the suggestion was one which should receive consideration. He believed that there were but thirty or forty of the Army Reserve in London, and probably no larger number could be found in any other place.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that in his opinion the best thing would be to abandon the plan, which was an admitted failure, and therefore he hoped the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War would undertake that no new additions should be made to the Army Reserve Force. Notwithstanding what the noble Marquess had been led to state on a former evening, he knew that at the Horse Guards it was admitted that the number of men who would re-enlist would not be so large as was stated. It was, then, the more necessary not to hold out temptations to men to take their discharge. For the future he should certainly like to see the Vote struck out altogether. At present those men were a myth. Nobody seemed to see one of them.

COLONEL SYKES begged to inquire whether the noble Marquess had received a single report from any officer in any part of the kingdom, stating that he had assembled or seen together in any one place a body of Army Reserve men in any number from two to a dozen.

LORD HOTHAM observed, that one of the objects of the Royal Commission on Recruiting, of which he had been the Chairman, was to get rid of the imputation cast upon the system of recruiting, that individuals were induced to enlist by false representations and by the concealment of matters, which, when they came to the knowledge of the recruit, produced disappointment. One of the modes suggested for removing that imputation was that every recruit should be furnished upon enlistment with a pamphlet containing an account of all the advantages to which he would be entitled and all the contingencies to which he would be subjected. If that plan were acted upon, the complaint made by the noble Marquess against commanding officers, that they did not inform their men of the existence of the Reserve force, would be entirely obviated.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding (Lord Hotham), that it would be a good plan to give each recruit such a pamphlet. He had not meant to impute blame to commanding officers, who naturally desired to keep as many experienced soldiers in their regiments as possible. With respect to re-enlistments, he could not admit that he had over-stated them, as the last Returns showed that the calculations had been fully borne out by the facts. He could not see any reason why the fact of men receiving their discharge should prevent them from being employed in the Reserve Force, and they did not feel any interest in their force if they did not encourage their men to enter it.

COLONEL NORTH remarked, that out of 7,842 men who had received their discharge, 5,292 had disappeared altogether. In Canada alone the men who would be entitled to their discharge during the present year would number 4,000, and those men would receive unlimited promises from the American Government, though whether those promises would be fulfilled was quite another matter. The probability was, however, that not one of those men would again take service in our army.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he had received no report upon the subject of the drill of the Army Reserve. The Reserve was called out and drilled ten days in the course of the year. Out of 11,842 men who were entitled to their discharge, 5,295 only availed themselves of their right, 6,547 re-engaging at once. The Returns did not give the number of those who re-enlisted within six months, but if it bore any proportion to the number of former years it must have been large. He could not give any assurance that the item would not be renewed another year. In fact, he was desirous that measures should be taken for increasing the efficiency of the force.

GENERAL PERL said, that the remarks of the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War thoroughly warranted the statement which he had made. The long-service men were those who re-enlisted. More than one-half of the others had accepted their discharge.

MR. MACKIE begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

COLONEL NORTH said, that such a Motion could not be adopted, because the men were already engaged. There was, however, no reason why their number should be increased.

LORD ELCHO: Is there any special staff for the purpose of drilling the Reserve Force?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot tell.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £973,031, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Manufacturing Departments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, inclusive."

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the Report of the Ordnance Select Committee on "Systems of Rifling for Small Firearms," dated the 26th of November, 1862. He did so simply from the belief that the course adopted by the War Office with reference to that Report had failed in supplying our army with as efficient a weapon as might have been placed at their service. The large amount of money which we were devoting to that department was not expended in the purchase of the best arm which could be obtained for the money. In order to explain clearly to the Committee the position in which the question then stood, it would be necessary for him to give a few details of what had been done of late years. The Committee was well aware that, great as had been the progress of improvements in our manufactures, in none had so much progress been made as in the rifling of firearms. The first start was made in the year 1851, and it was a strange thing that the Great Exhibition, which was to have been the inauguration of perpetual peace, was the date of the commencement of those labours which had for their object the manufacture of the most efficient weapon for the destruction of our species. As far as the British army generally was concerned, he believed that with the exception of Prussians, about whom he should have a word to say presently, they were the best armed in the world, for they had all been furnished with rifles. That, however, had only been the case during the last ten years, because in the Crimean war General Cathcart's division was armed with the Brown Bess. Every marksman was fully aware of the superiority of the rifle over the Brown Bess of former times. The Committee could judge of the efficiency of the latter weapon from the fact that a man was safe at the distance of 100 yards, even if the Brown Bess were in the hands of a skilful marksman. There were men now, however, who would hit a circle two feet in diameter three, four, and five times consecutively at 500 yards with the Enfield rifle. That rifle was a very efficient weapon, but since 1853, when the pattern Enfield was adopted, the improvements had been very rapid, and they now had the smallbore Whitworth, with which a man had lodged a bullet seven times in succession within a circle three feet in diameter, at a distance of 1,100 yards. His hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Vivian) who was both a Volunteer and a shot, had called the attention of the Government to the subject three years ago. A discussion had ensued in that House, and the result was the appointment of the Committee to which he had referred. He desired to call the attention of the House to the broad results of that inquiry. After a careful investigation the Committee came to the conclusion that the service rifle, as regarded the large bore rifles with the ordinary service ammunition, was inferior to any of those which they had tried. Their opinion as regarded the service Enfield rifle, pattern 1853, was expressed in the following terms:—

"The Enfield rifle with its present twist fails in precision at distances above 600 yards, and any attempt at improvement by increasing the spiral entails, as has been shown in the Enfield grooved system, a tendency to foul the rifle, and thus mars its efficiency as a military weapon."

They tried at the same time another rifle which was in the hands of the engineers, a rifle which took the ordinary ammunition, and which did good service in India without fouling, at a time when the Enfields were open to the objection. He referred to the Lancaster rifle. The Committee's opinion was as follows:—

Lord Elcho

"A strict and impartial comparison on all points connected with military efficiency establishes the superiority of the Lancaster rifle. Should it, therefore, be decided to retain the present Enfield calibre, the Committee are of opinion that the adoption of the Lancaster system of rifling, with a spiral of 1 turn in 36 inches, minor axis of the ellipse 0·572, will be attended with considerable advantage to the service, more particularly as it can be accomplished without necessitating any change in the present service ammunition or increase to the present cost of supply."

He had been credibly informed that we had at present in store 170,000,000 rounds of ball cartridge, the value of which was £658,750. The Committee stated that the Lancaster rifle was superior to the Enfield in precision both when clean and when foul, in its liability to fouling, and in simplicity of management, a smooth barrel being more easily cleaned than a grooved barrel. As to accuracy of aim, he would give the result of one trial from the Report of the Committee, showing the comparative merits of the two rifles. The following were what were called the comparative figures of merit:—At 300 yards the deviation of the Enfield service rifle was 12·69 inches, the Lancaster 10·06; at 500 yards the Enfield was 19·80, the Lancaster 17·58; at 800 yards the Enfield was 41·61, the Lancaster 28·35; at 1,000 yards the Enfield was 95·01, the Lancaster 43·51; and at 1,200 yards the deviation of the Enfield was 133·53, and of the Lancaster, 87·96. That was quite sufficient to show that the decision arrived at by the Ordnance Select Committee was a sound one, and was borne out by the facts. His complaint against the War Office was that, whereas the Report, dated November 26, 1862, condemned the service Enfield and recommended another rifle which might be adopted without any additional cost to the country, and which was infinitely superior to the Enfield in every respect, the Report remained a dead letter in the archives of the War Office, no notice being taken of it. Now, it was not as though the manufacture of small arms had meanwhile ceased. On the contrary, that House had continued to vote large sums for that purpose, and he believed that since the issue of that Report up to the present time upwards of 130,000 arms of the condemned description had been manufactured by the Government. That was his case, and he thought it was a strong one, nor could he conceive what answer could be given to it. It might be said that, subsequent to the Report, the attention of the Secretary for War had been drawn to another kind of large bore rifles, which promised better results even than the Lancaster. This view was confirmed by a War Office letter dated July 31, 1863, and addressed to Mr. Lancaster, which stated that the Secretary of State for War was desirous of seeing what the Lancaster rifle would do in competition with the Whitworth and the Enfield with the service ammunition. Why the Enfield rifle should be tried over again he did not know, unless, indeed, the interest in its favour was such as obtained for it this privilege, on the ground that some change had been introduced which would make it shoot better. Mr. Lancaster, as he was asked, got ready the rifles to compete, but he had been informed, in a subsequent letter from the War Office, that Earl De Grey had decided in abandoning the competitive trial. Why this decision had been come to he could not say, but rumour declared that Mr. Whitworth had declined to compete unless he were allowed to use his own special lubrication, which was a mixture of grease and wax. The service ammunition, with which the trial was to have been made, was lubricated with pure wax, and the Lancashire rifle shot better with that than with any other. Soon after this the trials got up by the National Rifle Association took place at Woolwich. Mr. Whitworth's large bore rifle there shot remarkably well; but if that rifle was to be adopted, it would necessitate the abandonment of our 170,000,000 ball cartridges, and a change of machinery, while even then he did not know whether it would shoot better than the Lancaster rifle at 800 and 1,000 yards. At all events, he could speak to the great accuracy of the Lancaster rifle at those distances with the ordinary ammunition. He complained of the Government for not stopping the manufacture of the inferior rifle, and for not resolving to have the best they could get for their money. He should naturally be asked whether the adoption of the Lancaster rifle would entail a large expenditure. Externally it was precisely the same as the ordinary rifle, and its parts would be interchangeable with the ordinary Enfield; the only difference being in the construction of the barrel, which had an oval bore. As to the machinery, no change would be required in the general plant, but new cutters would be necessary. They cost £5 each, and as there were forty of these machines at the Enfield factory, the Government might, at a total expenditure of only £200, give the army this first-rate weapon. There was possibly one other reason why the Government had not adopted the Report of the Committee—namely, because the Lancaster rifle was patented, and a payment of 1s. per barrel was required by the patentee. He could hardly believe that this could have prevented the War Office from adopting the Lancaster system, especially as he understood that the War Office authorities thought that Mr. Lancaster had been harshly dealt with, and had sanctioned an arbitration, which, however, was refused by the Treasury. When it was possible to have a better article at so trifling an additional expenditure, he looked upon it as a waste of public money to go on with the present manufacture, while, at the same time, gross injustice was done to the patentee. Another point was, whether the new rifle should be a breech or a muzzle loader. Upon that point there was much difference of opinion, and many officers maintained that a breech-loading rifle was undesirable, because the men would then waste their cartridges and fire away their ammunition too rapidly. But recent events abroad led many persons to believe that a small force armed with breech-loaders was more than a match for a larger force armed with the ordinary weapon. When the argument he had mentioned was used by officers, his answer had been, "Granting that the men would fire away their ammunition rapidly, let us suppose that you were going to have the command of an English contingent, and were opposed to a force armed with breech-loaders, would you then choose muzzle-loaders or breech-loaders for your men?" And the answer was, "I should certainly choose breech-loaders." It was impossible to ignore the success of the Prussian needle-gun, which he believed to be in many respects an inferior weapon, and when we knew that the Emperor of the French was trying to get the best breech-loader he could, and that the Belgian Government were doing the same, he thought it was time for the English Government to turn their attention to the subject, and ascertain by careful experiments whether a breech-loader was not the best weapon for the English army. Knowing that that subject would be under consideration, he had very recently tried a breech-loader, and with very favourable results. He alluded to the Mont-Storm rifle. When he tried it last year he missed fire very often; but lately he fired fifty cartridges from it without a single mis-fire, and fifty more were afterwards fired from it with equal results. It fired a great deal better than the ordinary rifle, and there was no escape whatever from the breech. To test that some fresh powder was put in a chamber under the breech, and it was found there after the firing, which could not have been the case if there had been an escape from the breech. With a plant which would cost £4,000 all our rifles could be converted into breech-loaders on the Mont-Storm principle at an expense of 10s. for each rifle. They had but a small army as compared with the armies of other countries, and for that reason it was all the more necessary that they should equip it in the best possible manner. If they did not do so, the Government and the House of Commons would be answerable for the lives of a great many men. He hoped, therefore, the Government would not hesitate to do in May, 1864, what they ought to have done in November, 1862—namely, stop the manufacture of an arm which was declared in their own report to be inferior in power to one which might have been procured.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he hoped to be able to convince the Committee that the course which the Government had taken in the matter under consideration, was not such as his noble Friend would lead them to suppose. His noble Friend seemed to imply that the question proposed to the Ordnance Select Committee was simply one relating to the different kinds of large bore rifles; but the competitive trial which the Committee had been intrusted to make involved every variety of arms which it was thought might turn out useful weapons, including large and small-bore rifles. The trial was a competitive one between the large-bore and the small-bore, between the various kinds of large-bores, and between the various kinds of small-bores. The general result of the trial was that in almost all essential particulars Mr. Whitworth's small-bore was by far the best military weapon. The Committee came to that conclusion in the passage which his noble Friend had read to the Committee. There were some minor defects in that rifle which Mr. Whitworth undertook to remove. The Committee did not, however, recommend that an extensive armament of our troops with the small-bore should at once take place, because that would have involved a total change of ammunition and great inconvenience would have been the result. While, however, they did not recommend a complete re-armament, they did recommend that a considerable number of those rifles should be placed in the hands of a certain number of regiments, in order that the arm might be thoroughly tested in practice. In consequence of that recommendation 8,000 of those rifles were ordered, and a portion of them had been issued to the 60th Rifles and the Rifle Brigade. They were quartered in different parts of the world, and their experience would show how far the small-bore rifle was a good military weapon, and whether it was superior to that now in use. Another question which the Committee considered was as to the Lancaster large-bore rifle. His noble Friend, in reading the answer given by the Committee to the question put to them by the War Office, omitted a parenthesis of very considerable importance. The passage, as it appeared in page 17 of the Report, was as follows:—

“A strict but impartial comparison on all points connected with military efficiency establishes the superiority of the Lancaster rifle. Should it, therefore, be decided to retain the present Enfield calibre (and in the absence of any data of their own as to the value of the polygonal system applied to this calibre), the Committee are of opinion that the adoption of the Lancaster system of rifling, with a spiral of one turn in 36 inches, minor axis of the ellipse 0.572, will be attended with considerable advantage to the service, more particularly as it can be accomplished without necessitating any change in the present service ammunition, or increase to the present cost of supply.”

The Committee having spoken very favourably of Mr. Whitworth's small-bore, Earl De Grey asked him whether he could not make a large-bore rifle on his system. There was nothing unfair towards other inventors in that; and the question generally was one which ought not to be treated as between rival inventors. Earl De Grey had to consult the public interest, and, accordingly, he took that course. Mr. Whitworth replied that he would try. He did so, and his experiments showed that he could not then make a large-bore rifle with the same satisfactory results as attended his small-bore rifle; but, in the course of his experiments, he did find that with a special ammunition and a differently shaped bullet and cartridge he obtained a most extraordinary result with his own rifle, and that the Enfield rifle fired the same ammunition rather better than the service ammunition. Though, owing to some peculiarity in the ammunition, the large-bore of Mr. Whitworth would not, perhaps, turn out to be a good weapon in the hands of the soldier, it was quite possible it might ultimately turn out that a large-bore would be the best adapted for the service; and if such should be the case, the advantage which the country would derive from the discovery would be owing to the course taken by Earl De Grey in not having, im-

Lancaster asserted its great superiority. No doubt the Committee found in the Enfield a liability to foul, but that did not give rise to any great inconvenience. He thought the Committee, when asked which was the superior arm, were bound to say they held the Lancaster to be so; but they were also bound to say in what they believed its superiority consisted, and whether it was a practical weapon; and Earl De Grey was bound to consider whether the reasons given by the Committee were such as to render the general introduction of the Lancaster desirable in the army. Considering also that the Committee were distinctly of opinion that, so far as they were aware, the rifle at present in the hands of our troops was superior to any possessed by the troops of any foreign nations—he omitted here altogether the question of breech-loaders—there was no hurry, and it was much better to make a trial before coming to any decision. His noble Friend had stated that Mr. Lancaster had been badly treated in respect to his patent, but he did not believe that that was the case. No doubt it was quite true that the compensation which Mr. Lancaster had received might not be adequate for his invention and to his services to the science of artillery, but he had nevertheless signed an acknowledgment that it was accepted in full compensation for his services, and the Treasury had refused to allow him any further compensation. His patents had already expired, and it was perfectly competent for him to apply for their renewal, to which no opposition would be offered by the Secretary of State for War. On the contrary, the whole transactions of the War Office with Mr. Lancaster had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, who were responsible for the granting of letters patent, that they might form their own opinion as to whether he was entitled to a renewal of his patent. All he wished to point out to the Committee was, that it was quite possible that the system which would be found to be the best would be the Whitworth, as applied to the large-bore as well as the small; and should that be the case, the adoption of the most efficient arm would be owing to the Secretary of State for War not having been too hasty in coming to a decision. With respect to the question, whether or not a breech-loader was desirable for the army, he, as a civilian, was not able to give an opinion. There was so much doubt felt among military men on the subject, that it would be necessary to make further inquiries before any system was permanently adopted. Last year he said that Mr. Wesley Richards' breech-loader would receive a fair trial, and two thousand breech-loaders had been placed in the hands of the troops in different regiments, and they would be reported upon by the officers. When the Report had been made, it would be desirable to consider whether the breech-loader was a desirable arm, and, if so, on what principle of breech-loading the troops should be armed. Mr. Mont-Storm's breech-loading rifle was a most ingenious weapon, but the first thing to be considered by the War Office was, whether a breech-loader was to be adopted at all.

Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he was glad to hear that the attention of the Government was about to be directed to the question of breech-loading arms. He entirely concurred in the concluding remarks of the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War. He thought that Earl de Grey had not sufficient grounds before him to justify an entire change in the rifles we were manufacturing. There was no practical difference between the Lancaster and the service Enfield up to 500 yards, within which range a battle would be fought. At 800 yards, the mean difference in favour of the Lancaster rifle was only two inches, and there was, therefore, no good reasons for the Secretary of State to go into an alteration of the whole system. It was found, on an average, that the small-bore Whitworth had a figure of merit twice as good as the service arm or the Lancaster arm. But Mr. Whitworth had made a rifle which was capable of firing the Government ammunition, and supposing it to be adopted, there would not be that enormous sacrifice of 170,000,000 rounds of ball cartridge which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had anticipated. In fact, Mr. Whitworth's rifle would fire it with better effect than the service Enfield. There was another point to which military men attached great importance, and that was the use of hardened projectiles. Now, those could not be used with the Lancaster rifle, while the Whitworth was admirably adapted for firing them. If the object were to shoot to great distances, it would be better to adopt the small-bore at once. Looking at it from all points of view, he thought the Secretary of State for War had acted wisely in allowing the matter to remain over during the past year.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed, that the Vote was one that raised several very important questions. In the first place, he would point out the very unsatisfactory manner in which those Estimates were drawn up. According to the last accounts, which enabled him to compare Votes with actual expenditure, it appeared that the amount taken for wages and stores in one year was a third more than actually proved to be necessary. He was not disposed to enter into the question of the relative merits or demerits of our rifles, but he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact, that for the last four years £9,250,000 had been voted for the two Votes more immediately under discussion. The House knew little on the subject, and the little which it did know was learnt, unfortunately, two years after the expenditure was incurred. The Committee ought, therefore, to weigh well the point before they gave their sanction to those two Votes involving a sum of £972,000, particularly when it was borne in mind that they had no information as to the stock in hand. Our store accounts were inferior to those of the French, because there was no one to answer for that Department, which was formerly called the Ordnance. It would, of course, be unfair to expect the noble Marquess, who so ably represented the War Department in the House, to reply to every question of detail, and it must be borne in mind that since 1855 great changes had taken place, to the great disadvantage of hon. Members, so far as the obtaining information was concerned, owing to the fact that there was no recognized organ of the Ordnance Department. When the noble Lord at the head of the Government was Secretary at War he got great credit for the able manner in which he discharged the duties of his office, but then he had nothing to do with the Ordnance, with respect to which fifty questions might now be asked to which it would be almost unreasonable to expect a satisfactory answer. A great loss of money had ensued from the manner in which we had gone on increasing our gun manufacturing establishments, and he was desirous of moving a reduction which would bring them down to the figure at which they stood two years ago. Mr. Godley and Sir B. Hawes, he might add, seemed to be of opinion that we might be carrying the manufacturing system too far, and it certainly was a somewhat extraordinary thing that when we knew what we wanted we could not procure it by contract. He did not think it possible for a government successfully to manage a department of manufactories, and the House ought to set its face against the further growth of that system. He wished to be informed what had become of the guns which had cost the country such an enormous outlay? He had been disappointed, not with the evidence taken by the Ordnance Committee, or with the Report proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), the best portions of which had been struck out, but by the absence of any statement as to what had become of all the money expended. Quite enough, however, was said to alarm, for it was distinctly asserted that it was impossible to ascertain the cost of anything manufactured at Woolwich. Let the House just look at the amount which had been expended on the Armstrong guns. From the year 1858 down to the 31st of March, 1863, there had been expended on Armstrong guns £2,528,000, besides £671,000 for ammunition and projectiles. He should like to know what we had got for those large sums of money? He had been amused to hear the discussions which had taken place about calling out the Yeomanry. Why, if hon. Gentlemen had turned their attention to those Armstrong guns, they might have saved enough to keep the Yeomanry out all the year round. Of the 110-pounders, 100 had been manufactured at a cost of £483,000, apparently before any of them had been tested, and it appeared that that gun had turned out a very bad one. He should like to know whether the War Office had adopted any system by which the country should be saved from the recurrence of such enormous expense, by the appointment of a responsible person who should ascertain the proper gun to make, in order that we might stick to its manufacture and confine our expenditure to that which was really useful. He would conclude by moving the reduction of the Vote by £6,000.

COLONEL DUNNE begged to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) was attempting to bring science to a standstill. He desired that we should discover a perfect gun, and then go on with the work. That was impossible. We lived in a world and at a time at which improvements were being made every day, and even at the cost of a considerable expenditure we must avail ourselves of those improvements. Four or five years ago the late Sir Charles Napier was constantly inquiring when the navy was to be supplied with rifled guns. What did the Government do? They called the science of England to their aid, and they produced the most perfect gun, not only of that day, but which existed at the present moment either in Europe or in America. The hon. Baronet said that result had been accomplished by keeping up enormous establishments over which Parliament had no control; yet, year after year, he had gone most thoroughly into the matter and had never been able to divide the House or to strike a shilling off the Votes. Formerly the question to be settled between the Commander-in-Chief and the Master of the Ordnance used to be what was the best weapon which could be placed in the hands of soldiers in the field, but of late years, since the rifle gatherings at Wimbledon and the running deer had been set up, every man had got so learned in the art of shooting, that lectures were delivered in that House which, however well adapted to an institute of Civil Engineers, had little reference to the business of voting the public money. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) looked at the matter rather as a target question than with reference to the wants of soldiers in the field. The Enfield rifle of 1852 was a great success, but the reduction of the size of the projectile, rendered necessary by the fouling of the piece, had diminished the accuracy of its shooting. The Lancaster rifle had the advantage that it did not foul so quickly, so that they might fire a much greater number of rounds from it than from the Enfield. Then came the large bore Whitworth, the great defect of which was that its inventor had thought too much of target practice. No doubt either the large or small-bore Whitworth would shoot very well if they were cleaned after each discharge, but they would be by no means so effective in the hands of soldiers in the field, who might be for some time without oil, and whose weapons would be exposed to fog, rain, and snow. He was glad that the question was being considered by the War Department, and he hoped that the heads of that Department would extend some confidence to their Committee; because nothing could be more discouraging than for the most able men in the service to spend two or three years inquiring into a subject and then to have their report treated as waste paper.

MR. COBDEN: I wish to say a word or two in reference to the larger question that has been raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby). I think he has put his finger on the blot in our expenditure under this head, when he refers to the great increase in our Government manufacturing establishments. It has struck me this Session particularly how enormously we have increased the amount of wages we are paying in our different establishments. Now, for the first year or two after I obtained a seat in this House—in 1841, under Sir Robert Peel's administration—we voted about £600,000 for wages in our dockyard establishments at home and abroad. We have this year voted £1,340,000 for wages in our dockyard establishments at home and abroad; and we have voted in addition £450,000 for vessels built by private contract, which, of course, would imply a very large increase in the amount of labour for shipbuilding. So that, in fact, the sum we are paying under this head for the navy this year amounts to nearly three times as much as we paid in the first few years of Sir Robert Peel's Administration. If we turn to the Army Estimates, we find that we are now voting for wages and superintendence in our manufacturing establishments £520,000. Now, that item was almost unknown in the Army Estimates and Ordnance Estimates when I first entered this House, so that you are voting considerably more than £2,000,000 this year for wages in your establishments under the head of Army and Navy Estimates. You may depend upon it that when you are voting that amount for wages you are incurring an immense amount of waste. Because there is nothing more certain than this, that whatever you manufacture as a Government you pay enormously higher prices for than if you bought it at a private establishment. There is another most serious view of this question: whatever amount your heads of Departments ask for from this House they are sure to obtain. Bear that in mind, and only consider what waste and extravagance in new machinery, new plans, and new buildings must follow from that circumstance. Since I have sat in this House we have voted five hundred millions under the heads of the Army and Navy Estimates. The fact is of so much importance that I will repeat it, for these fabulous amounts can hardly be appreciated. We have voted, during the period I mention, no less than five hundred millions sterling for the Army and Navy; and I have never known an item to be reduced or even altered by this House. Every line has been read, and every figure distinctly put, but they have all been voted. Some people may say that the mere discussion and supervision in this House must have an effect, inasmuch as there is publicity attending it. I think it has a very opposite tendency. When the heads of Departments know that whatever they ask for will be granted, and that this House is responsible for it, it is only an encouragement to them to increase their demands. There is no representative body in the world that I know of that has not a real supervision over the expenditure except this House of Parliament. We all read the other day how in Paris a most important vote supported by the Government was rejected by the Corps Legislatif; and in America the estimates themselves originate in the Houses of the Legislature. But in this House not one item is ever refused. This is not a question which hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House or the other need make a party question; it is one upon which we may all look with an impartial eye. I ask you, must not such a gigantic manufacturing system as this lead to extravagance and waste? Hon. Gentlemen opposite sometimes bring forward grievances about the small pay of soldiers and sailors, but surely they will admit that in consequence of this waste in the manufacturing departments there must be less to pay for the personal services of the men. We have heard an hon. Gentleman who lately brought forward a calculation, showing how much more our army cost than the French, and he was puzzled to find where the difference lay. I venture to suggest that a great deal of it lies in these manufacturing departments—in stores and establishments. We have sometimes heard it attempted to be shown that Government manufacturing establishments can be carried on as cheaply as private establishments. You have heard the opinions of hon. Gentlemen—my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. W. S. Lindsay) beside me is one—extensively engaged in business, and largely concerned in manufacturing establishments; they have taken some pains to investigate it, and they all agree that you waste about one-half by all that you manufacture for yourselves. And this, not only from an increase of cost for the articles, but because being your own customers only, and having large establishments, you are constantly led to manufacture things you do not want, in order to employ your workpeople. There is another cause of waste; you rush—your departments, having a boundless purse to go to, rush headlong into all sorts of experiments. Take the case of iron ordnance—of the Armstrong gun. Up to within the last seven years, the Government never attempted to manufacture a gun at all; they used to have a plaything of the kind in an establishment where they made a few brass guns. All the guns with which Wellington and Nelson won their victories were of iron, cast at private foundries such as at Carron and elsewhere. But five or six years—I think no later than five years ago—the Government was suddenly seized with the idea that the mechanical world had come to an end; that the consummation of all invention had been attained in the discovery of the Armstrong gun, and so they set to work and organized an enormous establishment at Woolwich to manufacture those Armstrong guns. What has been the result?

A Committee, which sat for two Sessions, has told us. You have spent about two millions and a half on this gun, besides the cost of the ammunition, and the Committee admit that for all practical purposes—except the 12-pounder field pieces about which no great difficulty was ever felt—the gun has been a failure. And the Committee closed their Report with a suggestion that, as the works were to be stopped, they should be used for the purposes of experiments. I must say that the wasteful expenditure of two millions and a half is a matter that ought to have been brought under the consideration of this House. I think the right hon. Gentleman who was Chairman of that Committee ought to have brought the subject under the consideration of the House; at all events it should be a warning to them how they proceed in their wastefulness. I attach no importance to the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham, and shall not wait five minutes to vote for it. Having seen during twenty-three years that no vote was ever reduced in this House, I think a man may abandon a field which in all that time never yielded him a victory, without any imputation on his courage. I do not think any change can be effected in the present Estimates. But I do think that the whole subject of our manufacturing establishments ought to be entered upon and discussed in this House. I sincerely hope that the matter will be brought forward by some hon. Member more competent than myself; but if not, I certainly will venture before the Session closes to call the attention of the House generally to the subject of our manufacturing establishments, to the great increase they have undergone, and to the great waste in manifold ways which has been the consequence.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was pleased to hear a Motion in favour of reforms in those establishments promised from the part of the House where the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) sat, for since 1853, when he had the honour of holding the office of Clerk of the Ordnance, he had been declaiming against them and received very little support. In that year his successor was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. Monsell), and there was introduced a system of casting ordnance which cost the country half a million, though he believed a gun had never been turned out according to that method. When the Armstrong system succeeded it, and was applied to it, these establishments had been growing ever since. When he first entered Parliament, in 1847, the principle was universally recognized, that Government establishments, except in very special cases, should only be maintained to keep down prices and to test the value of articles manufactured elsewhere, and it was since 1853 that the opposite principle had grown up and been acted on so largely. The manufacture of arms of precision might be justified as a special subject; so were shells and fuses, and equally so the carriage department; but latterly the Government had taken to tailoring. Over their enormous establishment in Pimlico the military officers at the head of it were excellent, but he doubted whether it was possible to carry on such operations profitably. Owing to what he would call the monstrous undertakings there and elsewhere, expenditure for military purposes had become fearfully swollen; but, with the exception of appointments, and the patronage obtained by Government by the number of appointments necessary in these establishments, nothing was gained by them. He denied that the efficiency of either the clothing or accoutrements of the army had been promoted thereby. As regarded the question of rifles loading at the breech, and small and large bores, which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had so ably brought before the House that evening, he believed that the idea of spending £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 to insure the shooting of men at 700 yards involved a great absurdity. Few men were shot at that distance but by accidental shots: great accuracy was only desirable for skirmishers and riflemen when so employed. In battle, owing to the smoke, men were nearly always killed at much shorter distances; and in providing a military weapon for our soldiers we were not bound to do more than keep pace with the improvements of foreign countries. Some of the so called improvements turned out to be entire delusions. The Prussian arms, for instance, he believed to be as bad as possible.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) had raised a question of great importance, and had suggested that there should be some one in the House to watch over the expenditure on the Ordnance and for manufacturing establishments. If the hon. Baronet wished to give him an assistant in the House, who should be answerable for such expenditure as had been referred to, he should be very glad to be relieved of a part of his duties. The hon. Baronet proposed to enter upon a reversal of the policy that was entered upon in the Crimean war, but of which the House had scarcely seen enough to justify it in returning to the former system. The hon. Baronet also seemed to propose that the War Department should be again separated from the Ordnance Department. He was not prepared to say that that would not be an advantage, but the subject was one which could not properly be debated on a Vote in the Army Estimates. It was true that there had been of late years an increase in the Votes for manufacturing establishments, but on the other hand the Votes for stores had been decreasing. By having manufacturing establishments in an efficient working state, the Government were able to dispense with the necessity of keeping up an enormous stock of stores in case of war. The interest of money on those stores had to be taken into account, and also the changes made in the construction of arms, &c., which rendered those enormous stocks liable to be superseded and become obsolete. It was not, in his opinion, wise therefore to reduce their manufacturing establishments so low that the Government could not call upon them to provide the greater portion of the supplies they required when an emergency arose. He could not admit that waste and extravagance must necessarily prevail in Government manufacturing establishments. If the hon. Members for Evesham and Rochdale had studied the report of the Ordnance Committee last year they would find that the question was raised whether the Government had not been paying the Elswick Company too much for warlike stores, and that doubt was raised upon statements of the cost of the guns and ammunition made in the manufacturing department at Woolwich. The Ordnance Committee heard a great deal of evidence. They did not give a decided opinion one way or another, but no hon. Member could read the report and say it proved that the system pursued in the manufacturing department of the arsenal was more expensive than in private establishments. The hon. Baronet said the Committee did not know the price of anything. [Sir HENRY WILLOUGHBY: I referred to the last paragraph of the Report.] The House, on the contrary, could see by the accounts rendered in the present year the cost of every article to the country. Mr. Rendel told the Committee that it was extremely difficult for the Elswick Company to compete with the gun factory at Woolwich, because it was so admirably and so economically conducted. Nor could he find in the Report of the Committee the sweeping condemnation of the Armstrong gun which was attributed to it. Even with regard to the 110-pounder, the Committee declared that it was useful as a chase gun, although it was not desirable to introduce it as a broadside gun. Almost every witness bore testimony to the superior accuracy and range of the Armstrong guns. The Committee, in their last paragraph to which the hon. Baronet had alluded, recommended that "a uniform system of accounts should be adopted for the manufacturing departments at Woolwich, by which the cost of guns and other produce may be clearly ascertained." The attention of the department was still directed to the improvement of the accounts. One element of difficulty, however, was the difference of opinion in regard to incidental charges, depreciation of machinery, and interest of capital. The accounts would, he trusted, soon show exactly what portion of the money annually voted went to the manufacture of each particular article.

MR. DALGLISH said, he had understood that the manufacture of large guns at Woolwich had been entirely abandoned. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: They are not making 110-pounders.] The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Clarence Paget) acknowledged that the Armstrong guns were not a great success, but he alluded to two guns, the Frederick and the Somerset, which he hoped would prove to be a great success. He should like to know how many guns the Admiralty had to show for an expenditure of £249,000 at Woolwich? He should also be glad to know how many guns, and of what description, would be turned out at Woolwich for the sum of £237,000 which was now asked? He did not agree with the noble Marquess that the manufacturing establishments in the public arsenals were conducted as cheaply as the establishments of private individuals, because when the Government went to a private individual they could stop the order if they did not like what they got, but when they manufactured for themselves it was a different thing.

COLONEL SYKES said, the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) had complained that since he entered Parliament upwards of £500,000,000 had been spent upon our army and navy, and he had never known an instance in which a Vote for either service had been reduced. But whose fault was it? Was it not that of hon. Members themselves who did not attend when the Estimates were being voted? He had seen on one occasion only thirteen Members in the House when hundreds of thousands were voted away, and that very night he had counted and found only twenty-three Members present. There were sixteen or seventeen Gentlemen who never failed to attend when the Estimates were on, but they became disgusted because they did not receive the support which they ought to have got from those who professed to be economists. And then, when a division came on, those sixteen or seventeen Gentlemen counted for little against the reserves of the Treasury Bench, who were brought in from the lobby, the library, and the smoking-room, to overwhelm them. But the country also was in fault. Why did the constituencies send representatives to that House who did not do their duty? The country might depend upon it, and he had told his own constituents so, there would be no reduction of expenditure until the constituencies took a pledge from their representatives that they would attend in the House whenever the Estimates were under discussion. Now £973,000 was about to be expended upon eleven different establishments, but what was the country to get for that money—how many guns, what number of small arms? The Committee had no means of judging from the papers before them. There was nothing but lump sums set down—no quantities of materials, no prices whatever. How, then, could the Committee possibly exercise its judgment as to the necessities of the demand? He would give the Committee a contrast. He held in his hand an exact copy of a similar Vote in the French Estimates, which was now being discussed in Paris, and in it was set down the prices, the quantities, the numbers of guns and of small arms that were wanted for the year, the quantities [165,000] of bronze at 2f. 60 centimes the kilogramme, the quantities [35,000] and prices of copper, zinc, tin, &c., the number of cannon, 465 to be produced from the quantities of materials and sums granted; of small arms, 32,000 infantry rifles, 2,000 dragoon rifles, 6,000 carbines, 10,000 bayonet sabres, 6,000 cavalry sabres, 1,200 cuirasses for the cavalry, and so on. With respect to the cost per head of the small arms factory for our army of 148,000 men as compared with the French army of 400,000, not including the reserves, it was £1 18s. 9d. in the English Estimates as compared with 7s. 3½d. in the French Budget.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

LORD ELCHO said, the debate had turned upon the question of wasteful expenditure, which might be of two kinds, either by manufacturing at too great a cost, or by persevering in the manufacture of an inferior article for the same money for which a superior one could be got. The latter was the fault of which the Government had been guilty with respect to the manufacture of small arms ever since the Report of the Ordnance Committee in 1862. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite in thinking it a perfect farce to depute men of ability and intelligence to sit at Woolwich to advise the Government on these matters, to pay £6,000 or £7,000 for their salaries and expenses, and then, when they sent in a clear and uncompromising Report, to treat it as so much waste paper. That was exactly what had been done, though the noble Marquess had tried to put the question on an entirely different footing. He (Lord Elcho) had not raised the question of the small-bore rifle. The Government had tried the experiment of the small-bore by placing 8,000 of them in the hands of the troops. But there were 130,000 Enfield rifles in their hands, though that weapon had been condemned; they were still being turned out at the rate of 2,500 a week, and the Committee was asked to go on voting enormous sums for them. The House of Commons ought to refuse the money unless the Government gave a distinct pledge that it would be spent in the best way. What he was trying to do was to get a large bore, which he maintained was the best for these two reasons—that it was less liable to foul, and a shell could be discharged from it when necessary. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. H. Vivian) was the originator of the Committee, and he urged as a reason for appointing it that the small-bore was superior. But the hon. Gentleman now turned round and said that there was very little difference between the two. In fact, the whole gist of his argument in defending the course of the Government was, that the Lancaster rifle was not superior at the short range, and at the long it was not much matter. [Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN: Not so much matter.] He had in his hand a speech made on the 25th of June last year by the hon. Member, in which he said—

"The elliptical system of rifling of Mr. Lancaster proved itself superior, not only to the ordinary service Enfield, but to the best of the rifles made on other improved principles. . . The Committee on Small Arms very quickly established the fact that the rifle manufactured by the Government was the worst, and, consequently, it would be satisfactory if the Government could inform the House that some tribunal was about to be established which would consider these matters before the country was involved in a vast expenditure. . . The regulation rifle was a weak weapon; the groovings were thin and easily worn down by the action of the ramrod, and after the firing of a comparatively few thousand rounds it became inefficient. That was not the case with the Whitworth or the Lancaster." [3 Hansard, clxix. p. 1462.]

Now, he wanted to elicit from the Government a promise that that waste of public money should be put a stop to, and that, pending any question as to what the future course should be, the Government should get the best article possible under the circumstances without increase of cost. If he received any support he would move a reduction of the Vote. [Cries of "Move, move."] He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £162,832 set down for the Royal Small Arms Establishment.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, the question raised was an important one, but the best way of testing it was not by reducing but by postponing the Vote until some definite conclusion was arrived at as to what was proper to be done in the matter. There ought to be a Select Committee or Royal Commission on the subject, in order that the country might be satisfied that a large expenditure was not being recklessly incurred. He begged to move the postponement of the Vote.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he believed that the present Vote was one of the most important in the Estimates; and he could not think that the public service would suffer by its postponement beyond a moderate time. The Government were bound to find arms for the service, and the presented was not the time, when the waters around them were so troubled, to stop all their manufactories. The effect of maintaining the Government establishments was to diminish expenditure. The gunpowder manufactory produced cheaper and better powder than had before been obtained; and with respect to the Armstrong gun, the manufactory at Woolwich brought down the cost of the manufacture at Elswick 25 per cent. The postponement of the Vote would paralyze the establishments for a time, and therefore he could not support the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend in favour of postponement.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he agreed that the present was a most important question. He understood that the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) desired to force the Government to expend the sum set apart for small arms in such a way as to introduce a particular arm into the service.

LORD ELCHO begged to explain that what he desired was that the Government should give an assurance that they would stop the manufacture of an arm condemned by the Committee he had referred to.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Government were responsible for what they did; but supposing the arm recommended by that Committee turned out a failure, who would then be responsible? A few years ago the late Sir Charles Napier, and various other hon. Members, called the Government to account for not introducing a rival gun to the French gun into the navy, and the Government were forced by that House to give a considerable order for the large Armstrong guns. He was not prepared to say that the Armstrong guns were not very good for certain purposes, and he was glad to have that opportunity of correcting a misapprehension of Sir William Armstrong with regard to something that fell from him on a former occasion. What he had stated was that, with regard to the precision of fire, and the precision of the bursting of the shells, there was the greatest reason to be satisfied; but that the Armstrong guns which some of the ships carried at foreign stations, and he referred particularly to the action at Kagosima, had some of the early specimens of vent-pieces, and they were a failure; but the Admiralty were taking steps to introduce the latest improvements, and he hoped that they would render these guns efficient. Comparisons had been made between the French and English Estimates, but it should be borne in mind that the English was an honest Estimate and the French was not, for after being presented to the Chambers the French Estimate was doubled by means of the system of crédits supplémentaires. It was said that the Government had nothing to show for this amount of £2,500,000, but he could inform the Committee that the Government now had 2,678 Armstrong guns of various sorts. It was said that a great many guns of one sort were made, and soon they became obsolete, and had to be discarded. That was just what happened with regard to the guns manufactured two years ago in immense numbers in America, and to the thirty pounders, hooped and rifled, which the French had first adopted. They were now going to a very great expense in the manufacture of guns of a new construction. It was a necessity of the transition system of the day. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) thought he had got the right arm, but next year it might be superseded by another. He thought his noble Friend was very unreasonable in trying to induce the Committee to coerce the Government in that matter, and he hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment.

LORD ELCHO begged to explain that he did not wish to force any arm on the Government. All he wanted was that a stop should be put to the present wasteful expenditure of the public money, and if the Government would not give any pledge in that respect, the House of Commons was quite justified in interposing. In order to give the Government time to consider the matter, he was willing to withdraw his Motion, if his hon. and gallant Friend opposite would insist on a postponement of the Vote.

MR. MASSEY said, that no Resolution in Committee of Supply could be postponed. It could only be withdrawn, amended, or negatived.

LORD ELCHO said, he saw no alternative in that case but to press his Motion.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he was glad that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had at length learnt to appreciate the Armstrong gun, and had had an opportunity of doing justice to Sir William Armstrong. With regard to the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), the choice of arms rested not with the House of Commons, or the War Office, but with the Crown. It was not for the Committee to tell the War Office they should withdraw a particular Vote unless a certain pattern was adopted. As to stopping the manufacture of arms, was it meant that a factory costing £100 a day was to be kept idle while the question of the relative merits of different arms was being considered?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was glad that the Vote could not be postponed, because of all the proposals which had been made that was the most unreasonable. He could not conceive what further information hon. Members expected to get. If they had another Committee, it would be two years before they got any money. In spite of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho's) repudiation, he could not but think that he wanted to force a particular arm, which even upon the showing of the Committee was only provisionally the best, on the Government. He must protest against the frequent alteration of patterns, because it tended to weaken the confidence of the army in its weapons. He denied that the War Office had altogether ignored the Report of the Ordnance Select Committee. They reported on several questions, and some of their recommendations had been adopted—that, for instance, with regard to small-bore rifles. He protested against its being held that the Report of a Committee which happened to be consulted by the Secretary of State was to be law to him. If that were so, the result would be that he would not be able to seek advice in that way at all. The responsibility of coming to a decision ought to rest with the Secretary of State. The superiority of the Lancaster over the Enfield was very slight, and it was a question for the War Office to decide whether it was worth while to incur the inconvenience of a change. The Report of the Committee showed that the Lancaster was only provisionally the best arm. It might be supplanted by the Whitworth large or small-bore; and the Secretary of State thought it was not expedient in the meantime to adopt it. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) had praised the French Estimates for the amount of information which they afforded. On examination, however, it would be found that the figures were stereotyped, and that for the last two or three years the same amount of metal had been stated as costing exactly the same price, and turning out the same number of pieces — an uniformity which was rather suspicious.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £810,199, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Manufacturing Departments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1866, inclusive."—(Lord Elcho.)

The Committee divided: — Ayes 35; Noes 80: Majority 45.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(8.) £572,519, Warlike Stores.

MR. W. WILLIAMS begged to inquire how it was that Vote was £266,000 less than that of last year.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if some of the items in the French Estimates were stereotyped, so was the strength of the French army. But the cost of the manufacturing departments in the two countries, as far as warlike stores were concerned, admitted of a very close and rigid comparison. He found that the cost per head for warlike stores was in England £12 2s. 6½d., and in France £2 13s. 11½d. No wonder complaints were made of the waste in our manufacturing departments.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to ask the noble Marquess (the Under Secretary for War) to explain the reason for the decrease in the present Estimate from that of last year, and if he could assure the Committee that by taking that diminished Vote he would still be able to retain sufficient stores for all warlike purposes, or whether he intended to reduce each description of stores in accordance with the diminished Vote? If so, it was to be regretted that we were to be left with an inefficient establishment; but if, on the other hand, it would give us a sufficient quantity of stores, it would be a subject of great congratulation.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH begged to inquire of the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War, the reason for the increase from £56,000 to £58,000 in the establishment charges for this year?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the reduction on the total amount of the Vote was almost entirely owing to the cessation of the Elswick contract. The small increase for that establishment was due to the change which had taken place in the clothing department.

MR. MAGUIRE begged to inquire whether the clothing made by the Government was dearer or cheaper than that made by contract?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the calculation of the department was, that it made clothing somewhat more economically than the articles could be obtained by contract. It was quite open to the trade to dispute the accuracy of that calculation, but since the establishment of the manufactory at Pimlico the contract price had been reduced.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £750,870, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and the Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1866, inclusive."

SIR HARRY VERNEY begged to inquire what steps had been taken, in accordance with the recommendations of a Committee and a Commission, for employing soldiers in trades. The health, morality, and efficiency of the service, as well as a great saving of expense to the country, would be promoted by a much more extensive employment of soldiers on work of that description than had hitherto been practised. There was an item in that Estimate of £5,000 for reading and recreation rooms. He was informed that the establishment of those rooms in our garrison towns had exercised a most important influence upon the character of the soldier, and that where they existed crimes had much diminished. The first soldiers' institute was established at Gibraltar by Captain Jackson, and was most successful while it remained under the supervision of its founder. Since then, however, the number of soldiers who belonged to it had greatly fallen off; and he would suggest that Captain Jackson should be sent back on service to Gibraltar, to renew his exertions on behalf of an Institution which had produced so much benefit to the garrison there, and also to assist in establishing similar Institutions at other Mediterranean stations. It was desirable that the House should have a Return of the number of our soldiers in garrisons at home or abroad who were educated and trained to different trades.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to confirm what had just fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney). There could be no doubt that the employment of our troops in useful occupations was one of the best means of maintaining their high character and efficiency. Great success had attended the efforts of Captain Jackson at Gibraltar, and it was to be hoped that the same system, which had the sanction of the late Lord Herbert and Sir G. C. Lewis, would be carried out in the camp at Aldershot, where great evil resulted from the want of some useful employment for the soldier. If that want were supplied in our garrisons generally, we should have a much more efficient and practical army.

COLONEL BARTELOT begged to suggest that the Chairman do now report Progress.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he must complain of the unsatisfactory and complicated manner in which the Estimate was prepared. He complained that the total estimates of works were constantly increasing without any sufficient reasons being assigned. He begged to move that the amount of the Vote be reduced by the sum of £75,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £875,870, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and the Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, inclusive."—(Mr. Charles Berkeley.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he trusted the House would allow that Vote to pass that evening. With regard to the employment of soldiers in trades, an impression had prevailed that it would interfere with discipline, and the scheme had been postponed in consequence; but the Commander-in-Chief had now expressed his willingness to try the experiment. It would not do to try it on too large a scale at first, but measures would be taken to introduce the system into one or two of the regiments at Aldershot. As to soldiers' institutes, in some large towns garrison institutes had met with great success, and at Gibraltar Captain Jackson had succeeded with great trouble and labour in getting up a very efficient establishment of the kind, but since he left there it had been in a declining state. It seemed that there always would be difficulties in keeping soldiers' institutes in efficiency, unless they were connected with the regimental system. The plan adopted at present, and which had worked so successfully, was to devote a room in every barrack where it was possible, to what was called a recreation room, in which the men were supplied with refreshments, newspapers, and books; and, with scarcely an exception, commanding officers took pains to keep up these rooms in a proper state. The increase in this Vote was due, to some extent, to an increase in the price of labour, and also to some extent to the cost of transport being now charged against the buildings.

MR. MORRISON said, he should have been glad to have been informed somewhat more fully what steps had been taken towards employing soldiers in trades for the use of their regiments. He could bear testimony of the effect in the French army of the employment of the men in trade, in the readiness with which French soldiers were able to adapt themselves to all circumstances. Great benefits had been derived from the exertions of Captain Jackson at Gibraltar.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he entirely agreed with the noble Marquess, that soldiers' institutes were most successful when connected with the regimental system. He thought that commanding officers would run great risks of making their men slatternly if they employed them too much in other than regimental duties.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he could see no difficulty in presenting accurate Estimates.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE begged to direct attention to the dilapidated state of the buildings in the North Camp at Aldershot. There was an item for the conversion of Haslar Barracks into a hospital. He presumed that the hospital would be a military one for the Portsmouth garrison. Another item which required some explanation was the Vote with regard to the Naval Stores at Bermuda.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he thought that the Vote was so important that he must move that the Chairman report Progress.

To report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

UNDER SECRETARIES INDEMNITY BILL—[BILL 85.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought the House was entitled to an explanation of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he believed that the Bill was perfectly well understood by every Member of the House. The Committee appointed to inquire into the question of five Under Secretaries of State sitting together in that House, had determined that the seat of the Under Secretary of State last appointed should not be vacated; and it was understood that that House would indemnify him from any penalties he might have incurred by the violation of the Act of Parliament. He was sure the House would be of opinion that no such penalties should be exacted; and he certainly expected that no hon. Gentleman would have the slightest objection to the Bill being read a second time. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Attorney General.)

MR. HENNESSY said, he did not object to the second reading of the Bill, but he thought the forms of the House should be adhered to. In Bills proposing indemnities for penalties due to the Crown it was usual to introduce them in a Committee of the whole House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had told them the nature of the indemnity, but he had not told the House the amount of the penalties which the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War had incurred. He had been informed by a curious Friend that they amounted to £153,000. He was glad to vote the noble Marquess out of those difficulties.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Annual Indemnity Bill was introduced in the way that the present Bill had been brought forward, and not in Committee.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the method which had been adopted with reference to the present Bill was a perfectly correct one, and that there was no occasion to introduce it in a Committee of the Whole House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Tomorrow.

UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that the present measure was intended to supply an omission in the first Bill. By the former Act the Assessment Committee had no power to appear at the sessions to resist appeals against the rate, and the valuation was consequently often abated where it should have been maintained. The present Bill was framed with the view of supplying that deficiency. There might, possibly, be other Amendments needed, but experience had not as yet shown their necessity.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. C. P. Villiers.)

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE begged to suggest that no appeal should lie from the mere fact of a man being assessed by the Assessment Committee, unless he first applied for the re-hearing of his case. Upon such an application he could take the appeal to the special petty sessions or the quarter sessions, but two appeals were unnecessary.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he agreed with the remarks of the hon. Baronet (Sir William Jolliffe). He must ask for more time for consideration of the Bill before it went into Committee. Unless the Government gave an assurance to that effect he should object to the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Thursday, 19th May.

VESTRY CESS ABOLITION (IRELAND) BILL—LORDS AMENDMENTS.

Lords Amendments considered.

The first Amendment, to leave out Clause 4, read.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to point out that the House of Lords had struck out the clause which empowered the guardians to bury a member of a poor family without compelling the whole family to enter the workhouse. He begged to move that the House disagree with the Lords Amendment.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he hoped the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) would not press his Motion to a division, as such a course might bring that House into collision with the other House of Parliament.

LORD NAAS said, he viewed the matter in the same light as did the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel).

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

The House divided :—Ayes 29 ; Noes 9 : Majority 20.

LAW OF DEBTOR AND CREDITOR— COUNTY COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I beg leave to solicit the attention of your Lordships to a subject which I believe to be one of great interest and importance to the people. That subject is the state of the law of debtor and creditor, and its administration as especially affecting the poorer classes of society. My Lords, I entreat your attention to this matter for a short time in the abstract, before I proceed to explain the provisions of the Bill which I am about to present, and which I trust will remedy some part of the evils now existing. The text of what I have to submit to your Lordships is furnished by the Returns that have been made to Parliament from time to time with regard to the operation of the power of imprisonment intrusted to County Court Judges. Your Lordships are aware that in 1859 the attention of Parliament was drawn to this subject, and those powers were, to a certain extent, modified; but I find, notwithstanding, that the extent of imprisonment is still, at least to my mind, fearful in amount, and attended with the most injurious consequences to the poorer classes. By a Return which I moved for some time ago, I find that in the two years ending on the 31st of December, 1863, no fewer than 17,979 persons were committed to prison. The number of days for which they were committed altogether was 309,777, and the number which they actually spent in prison was 257,251. Out of that large number of prisoners, and that great amount of confinement, I find that for one cause alone—namely, on the ground of not having satisfied the judgment and costs, having the means and ability so to do—no less than 17,850 persons were committed to prison, and the number of days for which they remained in prison were 253,860. Comparing those figures with what I have already stated, your Lordships will observe that this cause is a great and fruitful source of imprisonment. I beg your Lordships to notice that the liberty of many of these men was taken away for sums of money as low as 1s. 6d., 3s. 1d., 1s. 10d., 2s. 9d., and one person was actually committed to prison for several days for the sum of 9d. The sum total of the debts due on all the judgments at the time of committals amounted only to £63,438. Now, the 17,850—or as I will, for the sake of round numbers, call them 18,000—persons belonged for the most part to the operative classes—to the class of artizans and to the class of agricultural labourers—the majority being of the former class. I think the wages of an artizan may be put at from 20s. to 40s. a week, and those of an agricultural labourer at 12s. a week. Probably, therefore, I am below the mark when I value each day spent in prison as equivalent to 3s. worth of labour for each working man. Confining ourselves at present to this single ground of commitment—namely, having had ability to pay—your Lordships will find, if you multiply 253,860 days by 3s., and if you estimate that each of these unfortunate persons has lost one day's work independent of and in addition to the time he is confined in prison by his attending the Court, that the value of the labour actually lost to the country by the operation of this imprisonment, in order to bring about the possible payment of

£62,438, is £43,434. Surely no system can be worse than this—that whereas the labourer or the artisan has no wealth except his ability to labour, you subject him to the operation of a law that shuts him up in prison, deprives him of the power of exercising his skill or his strength, condemns him to idleness, exposes him to contamination, and after a certain period sends him out from prison demoralized, degraded, with the probability of his being unable again to obtain work without considerable difficulty. But your Lordships must consider, in addition to this, the evils that fall upon society by the operation of this law. I have stated the loss to the country of that which is its wealth—productive labour; but we must add to that what society suffers—first, by the augmented charge thrown on the county rates in order to keep these persons in prison; secondly, by the increase made to the poor rates for the maintenance of those who, being dependent on the productive head of the family, are by his imprisonment in many cases thrown upon the parish; and thirdly, by the aggravation of the burden of debt by the costs payable by the prisoners, which are of course added to the debt, thus removing to a more distant time the possibility of being relieved from the debt. Let me here ask your Lordships to pause and consider whether this is a state of things which ought to be maintained? On what right does the creditor claim a title to imprison his debtor? What right has a man, because he is a creditor, to inflict positive loss and evil upon society? Before he is entitled to imprison his debtor I think the least you may require of him is to prove that he gave credit to the debtor under circumstances which justified him in doing so, and which require him to punish his default by imprisonment. But, in the present case, as I shall endeavour to show, there is hardly a single creditor in a position to say that he has a right to demand this remedy on the part of society, in order that he may be enabled to recover that debt which he has thought proper to allow his debtor to contract. Let us contrast the state of the law as it is administered in County Courts with reference to labouring men with the state of the law as it exists with regard to other classes of the community. The debtor under this law may be imprisoned fifty times over for the same cause. The state of the law is such that the creditor is always on the watch to find where his debtor is employed, and then he

pounces upon him and sends him to prison, frequently three or four times, in the hope of wringing from him some further contribution towards the payment of his debt. Observe the great injustice thus done to the poor. If there was a single bright spot in the original law of England with regard to debtor and creditor it was this—that by the common law if a creditor seizes the body of his debtor and keeps him in prison for however short a time, that amounted to a satisfaction of the debt—having once deprived the debtor even for a few hours of his liberty, the common law held that the debt was satisfied. But the law now established with regard to the poor permits the creditor to send his poor debtor to prison again and again—in fact, there is no limit to the repetition of the right of imprisonment except the limit which a merciful Judge may be inclined, even at the expense of the law, to interpose. The law which is the origin of the whole of these enactments is a clause contained in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 99; and the peculiarity of that clause as it affects the poor man is this—he is liable to be committed if he has contracted a debt without having had at the time a reasonable expectation of being able to pay it—if he has contracted it without having had sufficient means and ability to pay it. Now, a poor man has no fixed means whatever, except what his labour and the wages earned by that labour supply. If, therefore, he is not in a condition to labour, and contracts a debt, he is caught by the clause, for he is held by the law to have contracted a debt without a reasonable expectation of being able to pay it; and if he complains that his labour from day to day should be held to be included in the words of the Act, but that he was unable to get employment at the time though willing to work, then it follows again that he has contracted a debt without having the reasonable means of paying it. The result is that the law has mortgaged the labour and earnings of the poor to their creditors for an indefinite time mercilessly and without possibility or hope of relief. The law of England was, I am sorry to say, until late times, in a very barbarous and savage state. In 1551 a case came before Chief Justice Montague, in which a question was raised as to whether a sheriff or his officer should supply a person whom he had arrested with the means of living. The Chief Justice, on that occasion, said—

"If a sheriff or other officer takes an obligation of his prisoner for meat and drink, it is void; for if one be in execution he ought to live on his own, and neither the plaintiff nor the sheriff is bound to give meat or drink no more than if one distrains cattle and puts them in a pound, for there the owner of the cattle ought to give to them meat, and not he that distrained them. And if he have no goods he shall live of charity of others; and if others will give him nothing let him die, in the name of God, if he will, and impute the cause of it to his own fault, for his presumption and ill behaviour brought him to that imprisonment, inasmuch as the sheriff and his other officers are not bound to find their prisoners meat. An obligation (bond?) taken for meat is void, for it is colore officii, and the sheriff cannot take an obligation of his prisoner but in a small number of cases."

The law did not improve for a century, for, in 1633, we find Sir Robert Hyde, one of the Judges of the Common Pleas, expressing himself in nearly the same words—

"If a man," he said, "be taken in execution and lie in prison for debt, neither the plaintiff at whose suit he is arrested, nor the sheriff who took him, is bound to find meat, drink, or clothes. He must live on his own or the charity of others; and if no man will relieve him, let him die, in the name of God, says the law, and so say I."

My Lords, I refer to these cases for the purpose of illustrating the way in which Judges almost invariably look at the matter from the creditor's point of view, which is also, as it were, that established by law. They have a notion that whatever the law has ordained must be right, and hence they regard the case with reference only to the creditor, and not with reference to what mercy, or, which is more to our purpose, the interests of society require for the debtor. At one period, the unhappy debtor was left to rot in prison. Then a more humane spirit came over the law; and the Lords' Acts were passed. Subsequently the Insolvent Debtors' Court was established. The principle of the Bankruptcy Court used to be to treat a bankrupt as a criminal; but there has been, as your Lordships are aware, a considerable modification in the administration of that part of the law, and I now wish to point out to your Lordships the difference between the law according to the County Court system, and that which has at length been established with regard to the rest of the community. When the first great advance was made in the law relating to imprisonment for debt, a distinction was drawn between the imprisonment of debtors, merely as such, and of debtors who have committed frauds amounting to a misdemeanour. By the recent changes in the law no man can now remain in prison as a bankrupt for more than fourteen days; whether he be a trader or non-trader he has equally the power to emancipate himself, unless fraud can be shown against him. I have no reason whatever to be discontented with that part of the Act. On the contrary, I hope I may be permitted to refer to it with some satisfaction, for I have seen the Queen's Prison—which had existed for an indefinite time—closed for ever, and that notorious nursery of idleness and profligacy transformed into an hospital. Under the County Court system, however, the debtor is subject to longer imprisonment; in fact, the County Court has become the parent of the very evil which we are now called upon to check. As soon as these Courts were established, there grew up along with them an infinite expansion of credit. Small shopkeepers gave credit in every village, pedlars went from cottage to cottage offering credit—every kind of temptation was held out to the improvidence, thoughtlessness, and self-indulgence of the poor man. It is his great misfortune that he now obtains credit ad libitum. The result is, that when he takes home his wages at the end of the week, and finds that a certain portion of them is required for necessaries for the use of his family, a struggle commences in his mind whether he shall pay for these goods in ready money or procure them on credit, and regale himself with the money in his possession. The consequence is that, in a vast number of instances, the money is spent in the public-house or in some other improper way, because of the facility of obtaining credit, and thus the poor man is inevitably demoralized. Nor does the evil end here. I learn from inquiries I have instituted, that the poor man who takes credit has, almost always, to pay from 30 to 50 per cent above the actual value of the goods if they were bought with ready money. When the shopkeeper demands payment the debtor is probably unable to meet the claim, and is carried to the County Court; the Court issues a judgment against him; and thereupon he finds it necessary to incur a fresh debt with another shop in order to make up for what he has to deduct from his earnings in partial satisfaction of the original obligation. Thus the poor man is forced to go on struggling with increasing difficulties, after he has taken the first false step. You must remember, my Lords, that in this case you are legislating for an uninstructed, half-informed body of persons, prone, no doubt, to habits of improvidence, delighting in recreations and amusement, and thoughtless as to the future, and hence you are bound to use the same care and caution as if you were legislating for children or women. The advocates of the credit system say that it is advantageous because it enables a poor man to get assistance in the time of adversity. There may be a few cases in which that happens, but they are far more than counterbalanced by the number of cases in which the debtor is demoralized by too ready and unnecessary credit. The Returns made by the County Court Judges describe the operation of the system. The Judge of a very extensive district in Wales, where there is a great number of poor labourers, says—

“There is an extensive system of selling goods, chiefly wearing apparel, by travelling packmen, on terms of paying 1s. or 6d. per month. These purchases are almost always made without the knowledge of the husbands, and not unfrequently of the wives (the purchases being made by the daughters), and when the payments fall into arrear, which is constantly the case, the vendor enters his plaints by hundreds, and takes out his judgment summonses in large numbers. There is, in Pembrokehire, Cardiganshire, and Carmarthenshire, a system of sales by auction which supplies nearly half the business of the County Courts in those counties. These sales comprise nearly every species of goods, and the intended purchasers are liberally supplied with beer, &c. The goods are sold on nine months' credit, with a surety, whose name is written by the clerk of the sale—A being security for purchaser B, and B being security for purchaser A. The auctioneer or clerk (who is frequently an attorney or an attorney's clerk) discounts the sale by a payment at once to the vendor, whereby the right to sue is transferred to the purchaser of the sale monies, of which the result is an enormous crop of action and judgment summonses.”

All the Judges, or, at any rate, a great number of them, concur in describing the County Court as a great machine for the collection of debts, which shopkeepers, pedlars, and dealers of that sort willingly allow the labouring population to contract, depending for the payment of them on the pressure of that tribunal. The Judge of another very extensive district in North Lancashire states—

“In the case of the Scotch pedlar the usual course is this :—He calls when the husband is at his work, tempts the wife with shawls and dresses that she really does not want or cannot afford, and gives her credit for them. She goes on paying without her husband's knowledge what she can save from the house money for perhaps a year or more; at last the creditor comes forward and demands the money from the husband; he beats his wife, and is summoned by the creditor to the County Court; thinks it unjust, particularly as the goods are sold as a rule (I speak advisedly) at three times their value; refuses to pay, and often goes to prison rather than submit to what he considers an imposition.”

He goes on to say that “you can have no idea of the extent to which the system is carried on in the North of England. I sometimes have fifty cases in one day of this kind.” This is the nature of the cases which result from the state of the law. I am unwilling to aggravate this part of the case with respect to the “tally” system, as what I am about to mention may be an exceptional case; but there is a case specially mentioned by the County Court Judge of the district of Cornwall, of a woman having poisoned herself, and on the inquest, it appeared that she had contracted a debt intending to keep up the payments. In the absence of her husband at sea, her furniture was seized for the debt under a County Court Order, and shortly afterwards she poisoned herself. The jury expressed their strong disapprobation of the “tally” system, and their hope that some stringent measure would be introduced into Parliament to put a stop to it. I take from a Return in reference to another county an example to illustrate the results arising in cases where credit may be had, and in cases where it cannot be obtained. The County Court Judge contrasts the circumstances of the mechanic at the Enfield Rifle Establishment, which supplies him with a great many cases, with the fact that in respect to the large body of soldiers at Colchester scarcely a private or non-commissioned officer had ever been before the County Court. He says—

“I would contrast with that the large body of soldiers in camp at Colchester, scarcely a private or non-commissioned officer of whom can I remember to have been before me in the County Court. I am at a loss to assign any reason for this than the knowledge of the publicans and other traders of the town that these men are exempted from being committed for debt, and are not, therefore, allowed to incur any. I am thus led to the conclusion, that it is not by wholly abrogating the powers of imprisonment given by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, and the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, that the desired object will be best attained, but by confining their application to cases of fraud, and by carefully defining the nature of the frauds which shall be so punishable.”

In giving credit to poor persons, the tradesman trusts to the power of imprisonment for the recovery of his debt.

Such being the state of the law and the result of its administration, I beg your Lordships to consider what, under the circumstances, moral justice and those principles of duty to which you would appeal, if this matter were now for the first time to be dealt with, demand of you. Suppose you found your law without any trace of imprisonment for debt, would you say that the man who had given credit had the right to throw his debtor into prison? Is that a likely mode of obtaining payment of the debt, when the unfortunate debtor has nothing by which he could pay the debt except his labour? But if you have a law producing such evils to the community, are you to be told that it is justified on the hypothesis that it may tend to alleviate the condition of the poor man in times of distress by enabling him to obtain credit? That is the only argument I find brought forward to maintain and support this state of things—namely, that this description of credit is necessary for the good of the poor man, and that credit would not be given without the power of imprisonment. I utterly deny that this description of credit is necessary or desirable, or that it conduces to the good of the poor man. I say that the very contrary system would produce habits of prudence, care, and of providence on the part of the poor; and these are the objects which your legislation should be directed to attain, and that it should not be directed to arm the creditor who unduly, improvidently, and in the spirit of competition gives credit of this kind.

I now beg your Lordships to observe the manner in which I contemplate to apply a remedy to this state of things. I propose, in the first place, to abrogate entirely the present rule of law that gives the power of imprisonment to the Judge if he is satisfied that the debtor has the ability to pay. I endeavoured to mitigate that power by introducing into the Bankruptcy Bill of 1861 a provision which required the Judge, in estimating that ability, to take into consideration the whole circumstances of the debtor. I have no reason to find fault with the conduct of the County Court Judges. On the contrary, I have every reason to be satisfied with the diligence, the care, and anxiety for justice shown by these judicial functionaries in furnishing their opinions on this subject. With the exception of that feeling which naturally actuates them in favour of the existing law, and particularly of maintaining the power of imprisonment, on which they consider the efficiency of their system almost entirely depends, I find nothing in their answers to the application for the expression of their views but great humanity and great anxiety to discharge this painful duty in the most considerate and humane way. But, my Lords, after abrogating the punishment of imprisonment for the cause I have just stated, it still is necessary to retain some principles of that criminal jurisdiction in this portion of our statute law. Therefore, there is a power to commit to prison on the Judge being satisfied that the debt was contracted without any reasonable expectation of ability to pay it. The result is that, by my measure, if passed, the law will stand thus: that if the debt was contracted by fraud, false pretences, or without reasonable expectation of ability to pay it, the debtor will be liable to imprisonment; but that imprisonment will be once for all—he will not be liable to imprisonment more than once for the same debt; but I hope to make that imprisonment not a farce, but a reality. I use the word “farce,” because, from the want of some general stringent rule, I find imprisonment in some gaols is a farce and in others a reality. A person committed to some gaols is permitted to supply himself with his own food and to have strong drinks. If a debtor should have been proved to have committed one of the criminal acts which I have enumerated in the Bill, then I propose that he shall be treated as a misdemeanant, that he shall be sent to gaol and imprisoned for a period not exceeding two calendar months, but shall not be subjected to any further imprisonment. I propose in addition what I trust your Lordships will consider a humane and wise improvement. At present the Judge is obliged to confine his attention to the individual case which is brought before him. If a debtor be brought into Court upon a judgment debtor's summons, the Judge can make an order only for that particular debt; and thus a rope is, as it were, thrown round his neck, and the unfortunate man is probably compelled to go and contract other debts in order to meet his liabilities under the judgment of the Court. I beg your Lordships to figure to yourselves the case of an agricultural labourer who, in time of sickness or want of work, has contracted debt to the amount of £7, £8, or £9. Probably his wages are only 10s. or 12s. a week. He is brought to the County Court, and makes an arrangement to pay £3 or £4. But in what way can he provide for the payment of the debt? There are scarcely any means by which he

EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. SCULLY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the proposed Act of American Congress providing for the reduction of Tonnage Dues on Emigrant Vessels, and for the appointment of a Government Commissioner of Emigration, who shall be empowered to contract for the importation of Emigrants, and for their transmission into the inland districts of the United States; and whether it is the intention of the present Government to adopt any measures either towards diverting into some of Her Majesty's Colonies the increased and increasing Emigration from Ireland, or towards arresting that Emigration by providing industrial employment at home, or by reducing exorbitant taxation, or by improving the Land Laws, or by abolishing religious distinctions, or by conceding to Irishmen some participation in the government of their own country, or otherwise?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, his attention had not been called to the proposed Act of Congress referred to until the previous evening, when the hon. Gentleman showed him an extract from a newspaper stating that such an Act had been proposed. There was undoubtedly a large emigration going on from Ireland, and mainly directed towards the United States; but the reason was obviously to be found in the fact that wages in America were very high, artificially high, in consequence of the war, while in Ireland they were comparatively low. Her Majesty's Government did not think it would be expedient, even were it practicable, to endeavour to resist such emigration by the providing industrial employment at the public expense. He must also say that he thought Irishmen had a fair share of the benefits accruing from reductions of taxation, and he was not aware that any alteration of the laws relating to land would tend to diminish emigration. Religious distinctions had, happily, been abolished; and he would remind his hon. Friend that the people of the sister country lived under the same Constitution as the people of England.

HALIFAX AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. AYTOUN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies,

Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask the sanction of Parliament during the present Session for a guarantee of interest on a sum of money required to complete the Railway from Halifax to Quebec; and, if not, whether the intention of doing so is finally abandoned; and whether any Correspondence has taken place between the Colonial Office and the Authorities in Canada and British Columbia on the subject of the proposed telegraphic communication between Canada and the Pacific, subsequent to that which was produced last year; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay Copies of such Correspondence upon the table?

MR. CARDWELL replied that there was no intention of asking from the House, during the present Session, any guarantee for the Railway between Halifax and Quebec. The subject, however, had not been abandoned, and was still under the consideration of the several Colonies interested in the subject. There would be no objection to lay the additional Correspondence which had taken place on the table of the House if the hon. Member would move for it.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I have heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, with sincere regret, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government is not likely to be in his place to-night, and that it is also doubtful whether he will be here on Monday; but the right hon. Gentleman has also informed me that he will himself answer the Question which I have put upon the paper. I would crave the indulgence of the House, while I state very shortly the reasons for my putting this Question. A Conference of the Great Powers has been sitting, at which Austria, Prussia, Denmark, and England are represented; and it is understood that this Conference is to deliberate with reference to the immediate state of things incident to the war. England has not ceased to be the ally of Denmark; and whatever may be the feelings of the representatives of the other Powers—"Order, order!"

MR. SPEAKER: It is the rule of the House that a hon. Member putting a Question must confine himself strictly to the facts necessary to explain it.

MR. NEWDEGATE: It is without intending any disrespect to the Conference that I have put this Question; but I think it is inconsistent with the dignity of England—[“Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: Any expressions of opinion on the part of the hon. Member are out of order.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I beg pardon. I will simply state that as England is the ally of Denmark, I do not think—[“Order!”] I will put the Question of which I have given notice, and which in a great measure explains itself. I merely wish further to state that the contributions levied upon the people of Denmark—[“Order!”] I cannot conceive that this is a matter of indifference to the House of Commons—[“Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: I must request that the hon. Gentleman will put his Question.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I beg your pardon, Sir; I see that certain hon. Members are combined to refuse the indulgence I asked, I will, therefore, simply put my Question, the terms of which, happily, explain my reasons for putting it. I therefore ask the right hon. Baronet, as the representative of the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt any measures likely to be more effectual than those which have hitherto been attempted, for the purpose of relieving the People and King of Denmark from the oppression to which they are daily subjected?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The hon. Gentleman has truly stated what we all know, that a Conference is now sitting, and we hope and trust that the first result of it will be to establish an armistice. Under these circumstances, and without anticipating events, the only answer I can give the hon. Gentleman on the part of the Government is this—that Her Majesty's Government will continue, in combination with the other Powers, to take those means which appear most likely to effect the object they have in view—namely, the termination of the war, and the satisfactory settlement of the questions between Denmark and Germany.

RAILWAY AND CANAL BILLS.

QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD HODGSON said, he wished to ask the Chairman of the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills, Whether the Committee will meet to consider the Clauses referred to them on the 26th day of April last by the House, so that any Clauses which the Committee may recommend may be inserted in Bills of the present Session to which they are applicable?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that the clauses had been referred to the General Committee, with the intention that they should Report to the House whether they ought or ought not to be adopted. That inquiry would take place, but they understood that it was likely that objections would be taken to those clauses by parties interested in railways, and it would not be just, therefore, that a decision should be come to without allowing those parties to appear before the Committee.

CRIMINAL RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. DENMAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the number, 46, given in the 18th column of page 53 of the Criminal Returns for England and Wales for 1852, as that of persons found “Not Guilty on Trial,” includes, or does not include, any persons tried upon a charge of Murder and found guilty of Manslaughter only?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, the Return represented the number of persons acquitted of murder and not found guilty of manslaughter.

SEWAGE, &c. (METROPOLIS), COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu), If he would object to an Instruction being moved to the Committee appointed “to inquire into any plans for dealing with the Sewage of the Metropolis and other large Towns, with a view to its utilization to agricultural purposes,” that they do inquire into the effects of discharging sewage into the brooks or rivers?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied, that the Committee had already to investigate a very large question, but if the right hon. Gentleman would bring forward a Motion as an Instruction to the Committee, he had no doubt they would arrive at some definite conclusion on the matter to which he referred. He also hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would allow himself to be added to the Committee.

WELSH STEAM COAL.

QUESTION.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the experiments on the relative value of Welsh Steam Coal alone, and Welsh and North Country Coal mixed, detailed in the Return dated 15th February, 1864, are regarded by the Admiralty as final, or whether practical trials at sea upon this question are about to be made?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, he had to state that those trials were not by any means considered as final. The Admiralty had ordered practical trials at sea to take place as regarded the Welsh and North Country Coal, and the Reports of the experiments were to be made to the Admiralty.

"AURORA."—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Aurora frigate, under the command of Sir Leopold M'Clintock, has been sent to the North Sea in the direction of the Austrian Squadron; and, if so, why a force more adequate to cope with any possible contingency that might arise has not been dispatched at the same time?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: In answer, Sir, to the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the Aurora has been sent to the North Sea in accordance with our constant practice in this country, that, when foreign squadrons are cruising on coasts where we have considerable commercial interests, we should have a ship in the neighbourhood to watch those interests, and for that purpose I think I may state the Aurora is perfectly adequate to the service on which she is sent.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The question just put by my hon. Friend assumes that the Austrian ships have left the Downs. I wish to know whether the noble Lord is in a position to inform us whether they have left, and, if so, what was the destination of the squadron which sailed?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Yes, Sir, they have left the Downs, but I really cannot answer as to their destination.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I wish to repeat what I stated to the House on a former occasion—that Her Majesty's Government have received from the Government of Austria a distinct and positive assurance that the destination of the Austrian squadron is the North Sea, and that their object is to prevent a blockade of the Elbe and the Weser, and protect German commerce in the North Sea. That is stated to be their exclusive object.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whether he has asked an explanation of the Admiralty as to the circumstances under which he, representing avowedly the Prime Minister in this House, was left in ignorance yesterday, and was placed in the painful position of not knowing and being allowed to deny what had been announced in a Government paper—namely, the fact of the sailing of the Aurora?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The question asked of me by my hon. and gallant Friend below the gangway (Colonel French) was whether the Aurora had sailed to the Baltic; and, in reply, I believe I stated there was no foundation for the report that she had sailed to the Baltic.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: Does the right hon. Baronet mean to say that he used the term "Baltic" in an exceptional sense?—that is to say, that he answered in the letter instead of in the spirit of the inquiry? I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he did not understand the question practically to be, whether the Aurora had sailed to the North Sea?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I understand it to be as it was expressed by my hon. and gallant Friend—and I think he will agree with me that I interpreted him rightly—whether the Aurora had sailed to the Baltic.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: I would ask the noble Lord to what place is the Aurora gone? Is she gone to Heligoland? I understand she is gone there; and I should like to know whether she is to remain there, or to cruise, or to go up the Elbe?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The last news we had of her was in a telegram to-day from Heligoland. She is there, and probably to ascertain the proceedings of the Austrian squadron.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that as it was doubtful whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government would be in his place on Monday next, he should postpone his noble Friend's Motion with reference to the Committee of Council on Education till the following Thursday. He might also mention that on Friday next his noble Friend intended to move the adjournment of the House till Thursday, the 19th inst.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS COMMISSION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I am sure that I shall not be accused of using mere words of course, if I say that the Question to which I venture to ask for a time the attention of the House, is one of the most important that can possibly come before us. It is, Sir, a very large and a very difficult Question, but it has one peculiarity which may be taken as a set off against its magnitude and its complications. It is, at least, no party Question. It lies above and altogether out of the reach of the conflicting opinions which divide the two sides of this Assembly, and nothing but the most perverse ingenuity could enable any one to show that Conservatives and Liberals are bound to think differently upon any one of the issues which are likely to be raised in our discussion to-night. The Commission, to the Report of which I am calling attention, was appointed, as many hon. Members will recollect, nearly three years ago. Its immediate occasion, though not its cause, was the controversy which had arisen in the periodical press about the state of Eton; a controversy which was at first angry, but which before it closed became on both sides more amicable. It was at one time proposed that the area over which the inquiry was to extend should be considerably wider than it actually was. The schools and collegiate bodies, which were ultimately marked out for inquiry, were Eton, Winchester, Westminster, Harrow, Rugby, St. Paul's, Merchant Taylors', Charter House, and Shrewsbury. The Commission was very fairly selected; it included one distinguished Member of this House, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stamford; three Members of the other branch of the Legislature, Lord Clarendon, Lord Devon, and Lord Lyttleton, selected, I presume, respectively as a man of the world, a man of business, and a scholar; Professor Thomson, now Professor of Greek at Cambridge, and Mr. Vaughan, late Professor of Modern History at Oxford; last, not least, Mr. Twisleton, whose learning and high culture are well known to all. Those who, like myself, considered that there was room for very great improvement in the present state of our higher education thought, when we read the names, that we had obtained a Commission which would be rather a fair representation of existing views than one very likely to report in accordance with our wishes, and we trusted more to the indirect effect of the information which we knew would be brought out, than to any direct effect which could be expected to arise from the recommendations of the Commissioners. I am bound to say that we have been most agreeably disappointed. I shall, as I proceed, have to show that here and there I do not agree with some of the views of the Commissioners; but with the general tone of their Report, and with the majority of their suggestions I have no fault to find. The purposes to be served by a discussion of the Report in this House, seem to be twofold: 1. That the Government may be encouraged to bring in a Bill with a view to carrying into effect such recommendations of the Commissioners as require the aid of Parliament to carry them into effect; and 2. That the attention of Parliament and the country may be called to the recommendations which are addressed to the governing bodies and the head masters of the schools. The Report is divided into two parts. The first, which is much the shortest, gives the general results of the inquiry into what is intelligibly, but loosely, called public school education, and sums up the general recommendations of the Commissioners, those, namely, which are applicable to all schools. The second, which runs to great length, consists of nine separate and very careful accounts of the several schools, to each of which is appended a summary of the special recommendations applicable to that particular school. It is, of course, chiefly to the first part that I shall ask hon. Members to direct their attention. Before we pass to what the Commissioners describe and recommend, let me recal to the recollection of the House what were the allegations of the educational reformers. It is, of course, chiefly to the first part that I shall ask hon. Members to direct their attention. Before we pass to what the Commissioners describe and recommend, let me recal to the recollection of the House what were the allegations of the educational reformers. They resolved themselves into two: 1. That the education given to average boys at the public schools was extremely bad ; and secondly, that the education given to the most successful boys was, when compared with the requirements of the age, sadly inadequate. On both these counts of the indictment the Commissioners have found, so to speak, a verdict for the prosecution, as they have also, upon a hundred other counts, some of which are of no inconsiderable, though secondary importance. Of secondary importance I say, for let it never be forgotten that all questions about the property, the external government, and about the internal administration, are only auxiliary to these two. Is the range of study wide enough, and are the subjects which are attended to efficiently taught? Here is the answer of the Commissioners to the first question—

“The education appears to us sound and valuable in its main elements, but wanting in breadth and flexibility—defects which, in our judgment, destroy in many cases, and impair in all, its value as an education of the mind ; and which are made more prominent at the present time by the extension of knowledge in various directions, and by the multiplied requirements of modern life.”

To the second question they reply—

“We have been unable to resist the conclusion that these schools, in very different degrees, are too indulgent to idleness, or struggle ineffectually with it, and that they consequently send out a large proportion of men of idle habits and empty and uncultivated minds.”

This passage is further illustrated by what follows :—

“If a youth, after four or five years spent at school, quits it at nineteen, unable to construe an easy bit of Latin or Greek without the help of a dictionary, or to write Latin grammatically, almost ignorant of geography and of the history of his own country, unacquainted with any modern language but his own, and hardly competent to write English correctly, to do a simple sum, or stumble through an easy proposition of Euclid, a total stranger to the laws which govern the physical world, and to its structure, with an eye and hand unpractised in drawing, and without knowing a note of music, with an uncultivated mind and no taste for reading or observation, his intellectual education must certainly be accounted a failure, though there may be no fault to find with his principles, character, or manners. We by no means intend to represent this as a type of the ordinary product of English public school education ; but speaking both from the evidence we have received and from opportunities of observation open to all, we must say that it is a type much more common than it ought to be, making ample allowance for the difficulties that have to be contended with, and that the proportion of failures is therefore unduly large.”

The view here put forward is borne out by the evidence of many of the leading tutors

at Oxford, summed up in pages 24 and 25 of the Report. The Dean of Christchurch says—

“Very few can construe with accuracy a piece from an author they profess to have read. We never try them with an unseen passage ; it would be useless to do so. Tolerable Latin prose is very rare ; perhaps one piece in four is free from bad blunders ; a good style is scarcely ever seen. The answers we get to simple grammar questions are very inaccurate.”

Remember that these young men, of whom the Dean of Christchurch thus speaks, are, after all, not the average product of your public schools. The average product is an even inferior article—an article so inferior that the head masters of all the schools, except Rugby and Shrewsbury, positively refused to allow the Commission to examine them for themselves, lest they should see how bad it was. The correspondence with regard to this is given at length, and should be read. How, then, do the Commissioners propose that we should remedy this state of things ? They begin by proposing to re-constitute the governing bodies to which are confided the selection of the head masters, and the making of those permanent regulations which form, so to speak, the code of each school. The constitution of the bodies which at present govern these nine schools is very varied—in some better, in others worse ; but in no one instance does it fulfil the conditions which are very properly insisted upon by the Commissioners in the following passage :—

“In some cases, as will more fully appear hereafter, the governing body was designed for a school very unlike that which it now has to govern. We are of opinion that in most cases, either from this cause or from the altered circumstances of the times, some modifications in the governing body have become necessary, and that, unwise as it certainly would be, in this as in other respects, to aim at mere uniformity, there are some common features which should generally belong to the governing body of a great public school. Such a body should be permanent in itself, being the guardian and trustee of the permanent interests of the school ; though not unduly large, it should be protected by its numbers and by the position and character of its individual members from the domination of personal or local interests, of personal or professional influences or prejudices ; and we should wish to see it include men conversant with the world, with the requirements of active life, and with the progress of literature and science.”

I do not think there are many persons in the House who will disagree with the general spirit of these remarks, although, of course, there will be a conflict of opinion about the constitution of the particular governing bodies suggested for each school. Nor will there be much difference of view about the necessity for revising statutes on the principles adopted by the Commissioners in these words. "The statutes of founders are to be upheld and enforced whenever they conduce to the general objects of the foundation; but they are to be modified whenever they require a closer adaptation to the wants of modern society." Subject to the general superintendence of the governing bodies, the Commissioners propose, and rightly propose, that the head master should be well nigh absolute. The greatest diversity prevails in this respect at present. At Eton, for example, a head master, who, like Mr. Goodford, had an experience of many years as a teacher, could hardly move hand or foot without the permission of his distinguished, but latterly very obstructive, superior, Provost Hawtrey; while at Harrow, Mr. Butler, fresh from college, was virtually independent of any control in the discharge of the duties of his office. The Commissioners think that the head masters should be assisted by a school council, with a consultative, but not legislative voice, and with the power of addressing the governing bodies when a majority desires to do so. How well an institution of this kind works, and has long worked at Rugby, is sufficiently known. How bitterly the great majority of the assistant masters of Eton regret the absence of any such institution is a fact not less familiar. Not many will now wish that the selection of the head master in any school should be limited by arbitrary restrictions; but with regard to the recommendation which immediately follows that, namely, that the classical languages and literature should continue to hold the principal place in the course of study, some controversy may arise in this House, and out of it. Having regard, I will not say to what is abstractedly best, but to what is best in present circumstances, I, for my part, entirely and cordially agree with this proposition; but, in the method of carrying out the eighth recommendation, I should in some respects differ from the Commissioners. It seems to me that the only reasonable object to be set before us in teaching the classics is to make a young man of good abilities and application, when he has finished his classical course, able not only to read with facility everything that is not extraordinarily and exceptionally difficult in the two languages, like the choruses of the Choephore or the Trachiniae, but that he should have read whatever is most admirable in classical literature, and that he should have a fair scholarly acquaintance with the whole of Greek and Roman history. That is not a large demand to make, even if you very materially curtail the amount of time now given to classics. It is not a large demand to make even if a boy only begins Latin at twelve, when you think that far the greater part of his time between that age and the period at which he leaves the University, say ten years, or the best hours of a seventh part of an ordinary human life, is given up to the classical languages, and to the knowledge to which they are the key. But is anything like this obtained at present by a course of classical study, which, carried on to the end of the University period, begins often at eight or nine years old? Is it gained, I ask, not by idle or stupid men, but by the very best of your students? Take the three classes of the classical tripos at Cambridge, and take the four honour classes at Oxford, and seek amongst their members for the kind of knowledge of which I speak—you will find the Cambridge men fail egregiously in knowledge of the matter of the authors which they have read, although more able to translate passages presenting some considerable difficulty, at sight. You will find the Oxford men, although admirably well acquainted with the language and matter of a certain number of books, and these very important ones, yet failing in the power of being able to read unfamiliar classical authors with sufficient ease, and very indifferently acquainted either with Greek or Roman history during the periods not covered by their books—very imperfectly acquainted, for example, with the age of Alexander the Great, or of the Antonines. Now, the cause of this is perfectly obvious—it is the exaggerated importance which is attributed to Latin and Greek composition. I am glad to see that there is an immense weight of evidence against verse composition in the appendix to the Report, but there is a clinging to prose composition in those languages, and even in some cases a clinging to Latin composition when the utility of Greek composition has been frankly given up as incapable of defence. I allude more especially to the evidence of the Master of Trinity, Cambridge. In this matter of composition the Commissioners make concessions, but they do not make sufficient concessions. I confess that I am on this one point thoroughly revoltionary. I feel that every hour which I myself ever took from reading good Latin and Greek, and gave to writing bad Latin and Greek, was an hour lost, and I defy any one to prove that such hours are ever employed to advantage, except by perhaps three or four boys out of a hundred, who happen to have the peculiar knack of writing what is called brilliant composition; and when you have attained to this pinnacle, when you can write Greek verses like Mr. Riddell in the Anthologia Oxoniensis, or Latin verses like Professor Conington or Professor Goldwin Smith, in the same volume, have you done anything better than gain an accomplishment entitled to rank amongst intellectual acquirements, pretty much as fencing does amongst physical acquirements? No amount of sophistry can prove that there is any one important gift of the human intellect which is at all more brought out by Latin and Greek composition than by composition in other languages. In discussing the question, there is an everlasting application of the argument post hoc ergo propter hoc. We are told, for example, that such and such a person wrote good Latin verses before he made good speeches or wrote good leading articles, and then it is quietly assumed that he had the power to do the one only because he had done the other. I will not raise the question whether it is in the nature of things possible for a modern to write really well in Greek or Latin at all, although I fully believe that the least successful contemporary imitators of Cicero would have smiled at our Ciceronian Latin, and the weakest poet who ever failed at Athens would have found little to admire even in the "Greek Verses of Shrewsbury School." The Vice Chancellor of the University of Calcutta told the young Bengalees the other day—

"Depend upon it, no man ever wrote well by striving too hard to write well. English can only be well written by following the golden rule which Englishmen follow, or ought to follow, and that rule is never to try deliberately to write it well."

Why should what is true of English not be true of Latin and Greek? The practice of orally translating and re-translating is exempt from many of the disadvantages of composition, and a chain of authorities in its favour may be cited from the days of the younger Pliny to those of the younger Pitt. It is strange that it seems to be so little kept up in any of our schools—only, I think, at St. Paul's. An immense amount of time appears to be lost at more than one of these schools in repetition. Much of this will, I hope, be done away with if the quantity of verses is diminished, or more certainly still, if they are gradually abolished. What is gained by making a boy say, for example, the Alceas of Euripides from beginning to end? To learn so much, and to have it ready at a moment's notice, is a task which costs even boys with excellent memories many hours of application, and when a boy has an indifferent memory, it must be a terrible infliction. It is stated in the evidence before us that, I think at Winchester, boys have been known to repeat as much as 7,000 lines at a time. Surely it would be far better if the authorities of each school were to compile a small volume which consisted entirely of really choice passages, to be committed to memory. Such a selection, if really well learned, would be a valuable possession for after life, but who cares to retain in his head whole books of the Æneid or entire Greek plays. The other studies on which the Commissioners insist are Arithmetic and Mathematics, one modern language (either French or German), one branch at least of Natural Science, and either drawing or music, to which are to be added a certain amount of religious teaching, History, Geography, and English composition. To those who feel inclined to doubt the expediency of giving instruction during at least part of the school course, in drawing or music, I would, without dwelling on the more obvious arguments in favour of these studies, recommend the perusal of some of the evidence given by that eminent scholar, Dr. Kennedy, of Shrewsbury, with regard to the bearing which they have upon classical scholarship. Nothing is more curious, indeed, than the little effect which our present classical training has in disposing the minds of those who go through it to the study of ancient art. Turn the six best Cambridge men and the six best Oxford men of their year loose in the Vatican, and you will find them hardly, if at all, more capable of understanding and appreciating what they see than any tolerably educated person. It may be doubted, I think, whether French should not be made obligatory in the case of all boys. Whether or not its utility, as a means of education, is as great as that of some of its rivals is, of course, an open question. For my own part, I am inclined to think that it is at present rather too much the fashion in this country to depreciate the literature of France; and I am quite sure that the precision of French thought, that sort of honesty as between author and reader, which is so characteristic of French books, and which makes you certain as you read them that at least the writer knows what he means—nay, the very limitations upon the power of expressing ideas which mark the language—are useful correctives to certain tendencies at present very rife in our own literature. But whatever may or may not be its importance as an instrument of education, its enormous importance as a subject of instruction makes it unnecessary to discuss its educative utility. It seems to me that the Commissioners have exercised a very wise discretion in postponing the claims of Italian to those of German. True it is that in favour of the first may be urged its affinity to Latin and to French, rendering it, as they do, singularly easy to teach in conjunction with these two languages. Then it is undoubtedly, in the Mediterranean and the East, extremely useful; nor must it be forgotten that the growing political importance of Italy, and the great awakening which is taking place there, will make it increasingly desirable to be acquainted with the language which is spoken by a great and powerful people. I must also admit that I know no means so appropriate as the study of the great writers of the Italian middle age for giving a lofty, ennobling, refined, and, as I may say, specifically Christian culture. The atmosphere, so to speak, which we breathe in the writings of Goethe is the same as that in which we all live. It is essentially modern. When we turn, however, to the Divina Commedia, we breathe another atmosphere. The world of Dante was a world almost as different from ours as the world of Sophocles. It is perhaps a hasty generalization from Milton, but one cannot help thinking that the early and deep study of the Italian literature is calculated to bring out in a very singular degree some of the finest characteristics of the English mind. The arguments, however, in favour of German are irresistible. It is at least as useful as Italian, not only from the number of people who speak it, but from the number of languages to which it is the key. The two reasons, however, which seem to me conclusive in its favour are the following. In the first place, the difficulty of really mastering it is so great and so serious that the most bigoted adherent of the present system cannot afford, if, that is to say, he has himself acquired it, to treat it as an inadequate substitute for part of that Greek and Latin training, the difficulty of which is, to the minds of such people, its peculiar charm; and secondly, because the literature of Germany is to such an extent a reservoir of knowledge and of ideas that, with the exception of the exact sciences, there is no one subject of human research upon which anyone can thoroughly inform himself without being driven to German sources. Take the very subject of classics. I do not ask, are there not many German books which are indispensable? but are there any books of much importance in use in our schools or Universities which are not either wholly German or taken to a great extent from German sources? So it is with history, so with philosophy. Open any book on the theological controversies now raging in this country, and, strange to say, neither on the orthodox nor heterodox side is there almost a single authority cited which is not either German or wearing the uniform of one or the other widely divided schools of German opinion. A suggestion is made by Professor Müller respecting the assistance which might be derived in teaching both Latin and French from comparative philology, and he mentions a grammar, that of M. Egger, the well-known Professor in Paris, which is founded upon this principle. I am glad to see that the Commissioners think that the suggestion may be turned to practical use. I am somewhat surprised not to have observed that any questions had been put, or any suggestions made, with respect to paying more regard in the teaching of Greek, to the assistance to be derived from the living language. This subject has been brought very much before those who in Scotland take an interest in such matters, by Professor Blackie, well known as the translator of Æschylus. I do not myself venture to pronounce any opinion upon it, but I cannot help thinking that it is a matter which calls for very grave consideration. I cannot help thinking that something too much is made of the practical difficulties which are to be encountered in teaching foreign languages to school-boys. The evidence on this subject, to be found in the blue-books, is very conflicting, but perhaps the best suggestion is that made in the excellent letter from Mr. Barry of Cheltenham, who says—

I cannot but be of opinion that if a school can include one Frenchman and one German on its staff, for the purpose of correcting pronunciation and looking over the higher kinds of composition, and can then entrust the greater part of the French and German teaching to Englishmen who have had a University education, and who, having lived abroad, are thoroughly versed in the foreign language which they undertake to teach, the work will be far more effectively done than by any other arrangement.

Small matters of this kind invariably come right of themselves, when there is an honest desire that they should come right, and people are not too impatient. Once let the authorities at our great schools become as anxious to make boys good French and German scholars, as they now are to make them good Greek and Latin scholars, and they will soon laugh at the very idea of there being any difficulty in the matter. Even now M. Vecquerey at Rugby tells the Commissioners that he finds the boys perfectly manageable. There is no wiser page in the whole of the Report than that in which the Commissioners—not one of whom, be it observed, is himself a scientific man—every one of whom, be it also observed, has been brought up under influences totally alien to those of science properly so called—sum up the overwhelming arguments in favour of introducing the study of natural science, into the regular course of our schools. They speak as follows:—

“Natural science, with such slight exceptions as we have noticed above, is practically excluded from the education of the higher classes in England. This exclusion is, in our view, a plain defect and a great practical evil. It narrows unduly and injuriously the mental training of the young, and the knowledge, interests, and pursuits of men in maturer life. Natural science quickens and cultivates directly the faculty of observation, which in very many persons lies dormant through life, the power of accurate and rapid generalization, and the mental habit of method and arrangement; it accustoms young persons to trace the sequence of cause and effect; it familiarises them with a kind of reasoning which interests them, and which they can promptly comprehend; and it is perhaps the best corrective for that indolence which is the vice of half-awakened minds, and which shrinks from any exertion that is not, like an effort of memory, merely mechanical. With sincere respect for the opinions of the eminent schoolmasters who differ from us in this matter, we are convinced that the introduction of the elements of natural science into the regular course of study is desirable, and we see no sufficient reason to doubt that it is practicable.”

Hon. Members will not, I think, consider that the Commissioners have done anything superfluous in insisting upon Geography being taught in regular lessons; although Mr. Blakesley, whose geographical attainments are well known, maintains, in some evidence which amusingly illustrates the effect of early prejudice, that it is vain to attempt what is continually successfully done even amongst us outer barbarians on the other side of the border. I am inclined to think that the recommendations, with respect to the mode of teaching history, might with advantage have been more specific, but the question is one which involves too much detail, and I will not enter upon it. It is difficult to understand why the Commissioners have not insisted upon all boys who go through a public school obtaining some knowledge, at least, of the outlines of English literature. This might easily be done without teaching it in class—if a course of lectures were delivered to guide the reading of the boys on the sixth form, or a paper upon the subject were set in the matriculation examination at the University. This is not by any means the only way in which the House can aid the University—indeed, no satisfactory reform will be effected in the higher education till the University learns that it is its business to aid the public schools by enforcing a reasonably high standard of attainment upon those who seek to enter it, and the public school enforces a proportionably high standard upon the humbler schools which feed it. The Commissioners have not thought it their duty to suggest any action of this kind on the part of the University, although it is in accordance with the spirit of all that they say, and is, as is clear from the evidence, urgently desired by all those resident members of the University who are interested in the studies of the place. But they recommend an examination before entering the public school, and this leads me to the only question which has been discussed by the Commissioners, upon which their Report is not unanimous. The twenty-third recommendation runs as follows:—

“Every boy should be required, before admission to the school, to pass an entrance examination, and to show himself well grounded for his age in classics and arithmetic, and in the elements of either French or German.”

Mr. Vaughan objects to that provision in this recommendation, which requires proficiency corresponding with age in French or German, as the one indispensable qualification to be required in addition to proficiency in classics and arithmetic. He thinks that a boy should be allowed to take up for his entrance examination the elements of some branch of natural science instead of a modern language. Mr. Vaughan's dissent, if somewhat lengthy, is well reasoned and important; but after reading the evidence of Professor Owen, Dr. Carpenter, Sir Charles Lyell, Mr. Faraday, and others, I feel very strongly that all the reasons which he gives for postponing a modern language to the claims of natural science, tell much more strongly in favour of delaying the commencement of the study of the classics. Dr. Carpenter's evidence more especially is well worthy the study of hon. Members, and so is a pamphlet by Dr. Hodgson, to which he frequently alludes. I do not think that boys who enter a public school at twelve years old ought to be required to bring with them any knowledge of classics at all. I think that reading, writing, and the simple rules of arithmetic, a fair knowledge of French or German, and a reasonable amount of geography, English, and general knowledge would be quite sufficient. It can be proved to demonstration that a boy who does not begin the Latin Grammar till twelve years old will, if well taught previously in other subjects better suited to his age, soon overtake another who has begun it at nine or ten years old. I think that great encouragement should be given to the study of natural science at an early period of life, and that a boy should have an opportunity of showing acquaintance with it, and receive marks for it in his entrance examination. Speaking of natural science, Mr. Vaughan aptly observes—

"Nor need its imposing name seem to disqualify it for a subject of examination in the middle and even lower forms of a public school. 'Greek,' which was once the synonym of 'abstruse' and 'unintelligible,' is now a subject in which boys of the lowest forms of public schools are daily examined. Natural science, however, like a classical language, has not only its elements, but its grammar, its accidence, so to speak, and even its alphabet, in each of which judicious and considerate examiners will be able to test the soundness of the knowledge of the least proficient."

Of course, when a boy entered the school in any other than the lowest form, it would be necessary for him to come prepared to a certain extent in classics. At Shrewsbury I observe that boys sometimes enter even in the lower sixth. All difficulties on this score would be prevented by the working of the Commissioners' twenty-fifth general recommendation, which is in the following words:—

"No boy should be suffered to remain in the school who fails to make reasonable progress in it.

For this purpose certain stages of progress should be fixed by reference to the forms into which the school is divided. A maximum age should be fixed for attaining each stage, and any boy who exceeds this maximum without reaching the corresponding stage of promotion should be removed from the school. A relaxation of this rule to a certain extent might be allowed in cases where it clearly appeared that the boy's failure to obtain promotion was due to his deficiency in one particular subject, while his marks in other subjects would have counterbalanced that deficiency had the system of promotion permitted it."

To a certain extent the Commissioners adopt what is called the bifurcation principle. Arrangements should be made, they say, for allowing boys after arriving at a certain place in the school, to drop some portion of their classical work, in order to devote more time to mathematics, modern languages, or natural science; or, on the other hand, to discontinue wholly, or in part, natural science, modern languages, or mathematics, in order to give more time to classics or some other study. Into this subject I shall not enter. It is clear from the evidence supplied in the very interesting communications from Cheltenham, Marlborough, and the Wellington College, that the difficulties which are in the way could be easily overcome; but with regard to the greatest of your public schools, above all, with regard to Eton, it is really not an important question. Make these schools in every respect what they should be, and improve your Universities proportionably, and the demand to enter such a school as Eton will become so great, that you will be able to dictate what conditions you please. You will be able, for instance, to say, that you do not care to receive any one who does not come to be prepared for the University, and you will be able to decline modifying what you have deliberately determined to be the best system of training for the mind, in deference to the requirements of this or that competitive examination. Make Eton what it ought to be, and it will be a school not only for England, but, within twenty years, for the upper classes of the whole of Europe. Three recommendations relate to the charges to be made to parents, and the stipends and emoluments of masters—both very important subjects, but subjects upon which we shall hear so much from the parties most interested, that I pass them by. With regard to the results of the present system of discipline, the evidence of Mr. Hedloy, the Master of Balliol, and Mr. Rawlinson of Exeter, is very satisfactory, and the latter says expressly that the change dates from the time when Arnold's pupils began to come up to Oxford. The Commissioners endorse the leading principle of that eminent man's school administration in the following words :—

"The principle of governing boys mainly through their own sense of what is right and honourable is undoubtedly the only true principle ; but it requires much watchfulness, and a firm, temperate, and judicious administration to keep up the tone and standard of opinion, which are very liable to fluctuate, and the decline of which speedily turns a good school into a bad one."

The thirtieth recommendation runs as follows :—

"The system of fagging should be likewise watched ; fags should be relieved from all services which may be more properly performed by servants, and care should be taken that neither the time which a little boy has for preparing his lessons, nor the time which he has for play, should be encroached upon unduly."

The buildings again of the great schools naturally come in for their share of attention, and are pronounced to be by no means all that could be desired, even at the wealthier schools. It has frequently been asked by persons who visited the Educational Exhibition, which took place in London some years ago, or the Educational Department of the great Exhibition, why so few of the numerous ingenious inventions which have been adopted in the best schools for the lower classes should not also be applied to the schools in which the highest classes are brought up. Nor has any satisfactory answer ever been given. But the evil to which I am alluding is much more serious, as any one may see who will look at the evidence, and there can be no doubt that, if it were not for the great amount of exercise which is everywhere encouraged, that the effects upon health would be much worse than they appear to be. With regard to games, it is perhaps more than doubtful whether the re-action which set in some time ago in favour of physical training has not gone a little too far, and has not, in some respects, taken a wrong direction. Cricket, for example, as an amusement is one thing, but cricket as a science, which requires to be studied for five hours per day, as we see to be the case from some of the evidence in these volumes, is a very different thing. It may be doubted whether any of the games popular at schools give, if too extensively practised, anything like the best training of which boys are susceptible, and I am sorry that no one appears to have suggested to the Commissioners to take upon this point the evidence of Mr. M'Laren, who has established at Oxford a great gymnasium, which is well known, I have no doubt, to most Members of the House who keep up their connection with the University, and who has, I know, made a special study of this subject. Another defect which is brought out by the evidence, is the absence of any system of training for masters who are to teach the boys of the higher classes. All those who have attended to elementary education know that the art of teaching must itself be taught, and I do not think that our Universities can be considered to do their duty until they devise some means of giving instruction in this important art to the many young men who now devote themselves to a profession which is every day becoming more highly paid, and more highly considered. Such are the principal points which are brought out in the Commissioners' general Report ; but before I pass to notice some of the more important suggestions which they make with regard to the several schools which have come under their review, I may be allowed to quote the passage in which they sum up their general impressions of the system—

"It is not easy to estimate the degree in which the English people are indebted to these schools for the qualities on which they pique themselves most—for their capacity to govern others and control themselves, their aptitude for combining freedom with order, their public spirit, their vigour and manliness of character, their strong but not slavish respect for public opinion, their love for healthy sports and exercise. These schools have been the chief nurseries of our statesmen ; in them, and in schools modelled after them, men of all the various classes that make up English society, destined for every profession and career, have been brought up on a footing of social equality, and have contracted the most enduring friendships, and some of the ruling habits of their lives ; and they have had, perhaps, the largest share in moulding the character of an English gentleman. The system, like other systems, has its blots and imperfections ; there have been times when it was at once too lax and too severe—severe in its punishments, but lax in superintendence and prevention ; it has permitted, if not encouraged, some roughness, tyranny, and licence, but these defects have not seriously marred its wholesome operation, and it appears to have gradually purged itself from them in a remarkable degree. Its growth, no doubt, is largely due to those very qualities in our national character which it has itself contributed to form ; but justice bids us add that it is due likewise to the wise munificence which founded the institutions under whose shelter it has been enabled to take root, and to the good sense, temper, and ability of the men by whom, during successive generations, they have been governed."

This is true, but there is another and a sadder side to the picture. Go back fifty years, and read Sydney Smith's articles in the early numbers of the Edinburgh. What are the most important recommendations of this Report but an echo of his words to which so few listened. But his doctrines were not new doctrines. You will find them in Locke's treatise on Education. You will find them farther back still in Milton's noble paper. Nay, some of them you will find even in the writings of Ascham. If our fathers had only listened to those great men, what a waste of power would have been saved, and how much further advanced in all true civilization this England of ours would have been. Of all the schools which came under their review, Rugby seems best to have pleased the Commissioners. This distinction it owes partly to the wholesome interference of the Legislature, partly to the conscientious manner in which the Trustees discharge their duty, but above all to the great impulse which was given to it by Dr. Arnold. Nor must it be forgotten that since his death two out of its three head masters have been men of superior merit, and that they have been ably seconded by the assistant masters. The following is the language of the Report :—

"A system of mental training which comprehends almost every subject by which the minds of boys can be enlarged and invigorated ; a traditional spirit amongst the boys of respect and honour for intellectual work ; a system of discipline which, while maintaining the noble and wholesome tradition of public schools, that the able and more industrious should command and govern the rest, still holds in reserve a maturer discretion to moderate excess, quiet uncertainty, and also to support the legitimate exercise of power ; a system of physical training which, while it distinguishes the strong, strengthens the studious and spares the weak ; a religious cultivation, which, though active, is not overstrained, but leaves something for solemn occasions to bring out. Such are some of the general conditions which have presented themselves to notice during our investigation. They go far also, we think, to explain that public confidence which the school has for many years possessed, and never since the days of Arnold in larger measure than at the present moment."

The most important of the sixty-seven special recommendations of the Commissioners relating to this school appear to be those which suggest that the Local Trustees should be re-inforced by four gentlemen elected on account of generally acknowledged eminence in literature and science ; that the number of the school should be limited to 500 ; that the incomes of the classical assistant masters should vary from £500 to £1,400 ; that the local privileges of the neighbourhood of Rugby with reference to the school should be gradually abolished, in a way so as not by possibility to affect vested interests ; that new scholarships and exhibitions should be founded and regulated according to the most approved principles ; and that there should not be less than three classical masters to each 100 boys. In strong and unmelancholy contrast to Rugby, we have the once famous Westminster. It is not only that the state of scholarship there is, as is proved by the evidence of Dr. Scott, the head master, wretchedly, and indeed ludicrously low, but that, at least in college, the worst evils of the worst old times of our schools are in full vigour. Hon. Members will do well to turn to the evidence of Mr. Meyrick and his son, and to compare it with the counter evidence of Dr. Scott and several other witnesses. They will, I am sure, be unable to resist the conclusion that, although there may have been some exaggerations in the statements of the accusers, the evidence for the defence so completely breaks down, that it would be to push courtesy and respect of persons to the extreme if I were to refrain from saying, that the revelations about Westminster School which these volumes contain, reflect the greatest disgrace upon all those who have had any share in its management for some time back. There is one thing which I do not understand, and that is why the late Dean, whose position towards the College is defined, I believe, by the statutes to be that of mens in corpore, had not an opportunity of coming before the Commissioners, and explaining how it was that the condition of things, which we have now disclosed to us, was permitted to go on under his eye, and virtually with his sanction. I am sure the eminent ecclesiastic in question, the present Archbishop of Dublin, will thank me for thus giving him a reason for stepping forward to take his share of the responsibility for the state of Westminster, instead of allowing it to rest entirely upon the shoulders of his subordinates. I am happy, Sir, to think that the present Dean has given hostages to society in the publication of the Life of Arnold. He dared not allow these infamies to go on if he would, and he is the last man in the world to do so ; but I must remind the public that cathedral bodies move slowly, and I think no man who has read this evidence will be foolish enough to send his son to Westminster, until the Dean and Chapter can point, not only to promises of reform, but to a reform which shall amount to a revolution, already accomplished. So grossly, however, has the place been mismanaged that, I trust, the new governing body, which the Commissioners propose, may be called into existence as soon as possible. Most people who look at the question of the future of Westminster School unbiassed by sentiment, will, I presume, agree with Dr. Scott in thinking that, if it is to continue on its present site, it ought to be a day-school, and not a boarding-school. From Westminster, we pass naturally to the other London schools, which must be dismissed very shortly. The Commissioners are decidedly of opinion that the great and wealthy foundation of the Charter House would thrive much better as a boarding-school if removed into the country. There are not in this case any objections of the kind which have to be combated by those who desire that Westminster should remain a boarding-school, and be removed from its present site. Sutton's Hospital, which is connected with the Charter House school, and is a mere charitable institution, would, of course, remain where it is. The evidence relating to St. Paul's is peculiarly interesting, and fully bears out the Commissioners in their proposal to transfer it from its present most inconvenient position to one more suitable for boys—say, perhaps, the neighbourhood of the Regent's Park. It is now doing very little, whereas it is quite clear that it might be the first day-school not only in London, but in England. Its surplus revenue amounts to a very large sum, its accumulated capital is very great, and in little more than twenty years it will become very much richer. Surely it should be made what Dean Colet evidently intended it to be—an institution yielding to none in giving a really high class of education. There is, or is said to be, a question of law relating to the property of this school, about which a judicial decision should be immediately taken. What that decision will be, one can hardly doubt, as it is scarcely credible that Dean Colet, who was extremely anxious for the promotion of learning, should have wished the Mercers' Company to have been beneficially interested in the surplus revenues of his property, and only obliged to maintain the school as a charge upon them. Merchant Taylors' is in a somewhat different position. At St. Paul's School the Mercers' Company do not admit themselves to be trustees in the legal sense of the term of Dean Colet's estates for the benefit of the school, but they do admit that they are bound to maintain the school. The Merchant Taylors' Company, on the other hand, hold themselves free from all legal obligation whatever, and say that they might abolish their school altogether if they pleased. It is more than doubtful whether they could do so, as considerable endowments have been given to them and accepted for the benefit of the school; nay, even the present site of the school was wholly or partially purchased with money given for the purpose of establishing a school by an individual member of the company. The Commissioners do not attempt to decide how far the claims of the Merchant Taylors' Company can be upheld, but they do not in this case suggest any change in the governing body. More than seventy pages of the Report are devoted to Eton, and it would be necessary for me to dwell upon them at much length if I were speaking to almost any other audience. There are, however, so many Etonians in the House of Commons that it would not become me to do more than to indicate a few points, with regard to which it would be extremely interesting to hear the views of many Gentlemen whom I now address. First, then, it will be desirable to know whether the Commissioners are likely to be supported in the recommendation about the governing body of Eton, or whether it would not be more in accordance with the general opinion that the Provost and Fellows should altogether cease to have any part in the government of the school. The manner in which the property entrusted to their care has been managed is such that it is evident that, in determining what their future position is to be, the Legislature must be guided simply by the consideration of what is likely to be best for the school. Then, again, I presume that a good deal of difference of opinion is likely to arise with regard to the twenty-first special recommendation about Eton, that, namely, the number of boys should never exceed 800: 650 in the upper, and 150 in the lower school. Further, the scheme suggested for the remuneration of the head master and the other masters, to be found in pages 124 and 125—which excites, I am told, dire indignation at Eton—will probably give rise to discussion; and there are many other points which may also be debated. I suppose all will admit, after reading the evidence, that the time table should be revised, the school books improved—scholarships, exhibitions, and so forth, opened to competitive examination; that greater temptations to work should be held out to oppidans; the system upon which the college property is now managed should be revolutionized; and that the position of the mathematical masters should be improved. In the Session of 1861, I had several communications from the hon. Baronet the Member for the University, as well as from the Warden of Winchester. They were both desirous that that great foundation—the oldest of all our public schools, and the model upon which Eton was constructed—should be exempted from the Commission which I proposed. Their reason was, that Winchester had been to a certain extent examined into by the Oxford Commissioners in consequence of its connection with New College. This was not eventually done. I do not think that the hon. Baronet has, however, any reason to regret the course which has been taken. This institution, of which he was so distinguished a pupil, and which has contributed to this House not a few of its most distinguished Members, has quite held its own amongst the schools into which the Commission has examined. Here, as elsewhere, they have found a bad system, but that bad system has of late been worked with much ability and devotion. The position of Winchester and of Harrow is totally different. Winchester is very rich, possessing an income from endowments of at least £16,000 a year; while Harrow derives from endowments not much more than £1,000 a year. Nevertheless, Harrow, chiefly perhaps from its nearness to London, has acquired a far more important place than Winchester amongst our educational institutions. There is, however, less for legislation to do at Harrow than almost anywhere else; on the other hand, the masters there, who are at this moment a very distinguished body of men, are more likely than almost any other person in their position to be speedily influenced by the recommendations of these Commissioners, and by the force of public opinion, to elicit which is one of the main objects of my making this Motion to-night. The last school into which the Commissioners were instructed to examine was the Free Grammar School of King Edward VI. at Shrewsbury. This foundation lies on the boundary line, I think, we may say, between the public schools usually so called and the other endowed schools of the country, and some controversy has arisen in recent years as to whether its future should be that of a first-rate school, or whether it should be adapted rather to the wants of the middle class, as of course the majority of the endowed schools ought forthwith to be. The Commissioners have decided that it should remain a first-rate school, and I think they have decided wisely. A school which 300 years ago brought together the two most celebrated of English friends, Fulke Greville and Philip Sydney, which in our own day has educated so many distinguished scholars, and contributes, as the Commissioners justly observe, so disproportionately large a share to the teaching power of the two Universities, should on no account be allowed to fall into the second rank. The Commissioners say that the people of Shrewsbury should turn their attention rather to creating a good proprietary school in the town, than to making the present school fulfil the purpose of an institution for giving what is loosely called middle-class education. The demand, however, for that kind of education throughout the country is becoming so loud that I think we must determine ere long to break up and remodel our utterly inefficient network of endowed schools. In the year 1861, when I first proposed a Commission to inquire into the higher school education to the then Home Secretary, I contemplated a Commission which should inquire at once into the public schools and the grammar schools. Sir George Lewis wisely, however, thought that that was too large a scheme. I trust, however, that the Government will not lose sight of the truth that thirty good schools for the middle classes dotted over the face of England would be an enormous boon to them, and would do five times more to advance education than all the second and third rate grammar schools put together. We have not on this side of the Channel committed the folly which Burke so well exposed in the case of our neighbours, when they swept away the splendid foundations of mediæval munificence; but we certainly in many cases by gross neglect do our best to make them as useless as possible. And now, Sir, I have but one word more. Throughout I have wished to address myself to those who think that the Commissioners have gone too far, rather than to those who think that they have not gone far enough ; and yet I know that there will be many who will feel this, and who will say that the Report would be less favourable if it had been drawn up by less friendly hands ; for let it not be forgotten, the Lion has been for once painted by himself. To all those, however, I would say, that all times in England belong more or less to the men of half measures, and of compromises ; but this time, perhaps, even more than most other times. Perhaps, however, in educational matters, and not in them alone, we are approaching the end of an epoch. A more logical and consequent generation will, I trust, carry reform farther when we have crumbled into dust. Sir, I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the state of the higher School Education in England is not satisfactory, and calls for the early attention of Her Majesty's Government,"—(Mr. Grant Duff.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Sir, I rise to offer a few remarks upon the Motion made by my hon. Friend, and upon the precise position of the important question relating to public schools, as left by the Commissioners. My hon. Friend has explained his views in a speech of a very comprehensive character and great length. Will he permit me to say that I heard one portion of it with regret ? I think the condemnation passed by my hon. Friend upon the School of Westminster might have been spared. I do not mean to say that my hon. Friend is not discharging his duty as a Member of Parliament in pronouncing, at a proper time, any judgment at which he might arrive after adequate examination of public documents ; but what I feel is, that, as a very short time has elapsed since the voluminous records of the labours of the Commission have been submitted to the world, it is almost impossible, if hon. Members can be sufficiently prepared, to try the very serious accusations which he has made against all those connected with the management of Westminster School ; and I think that accusations of that grave character had better be reserved until the assembly to which they are addressed is in a condition to deal with them. I have no doubt that the evils have been of a serious character, because they are so described in the Report of the Commission ; but the Commissioners mention that measures have been taken by persons in authority for applying remedies to those evils at Winchester, and they express a hope that those remedies will be adequate to their purpose. So much I think it right to say, in justice as much to the feelings of those among us who may be interested in Westminster as to those out of doors who will attach great weight to what falls from an hon. Gentleman who has paid so much attention to the subject as has my hon. Friend. Having taken a great liberty in criticizing a portion of the speech of my hon. Friend, let me congratulate him, as the person to whom the appointment of this Commission was, I believe, principally due, upon having devoted his mind, his time, and his attention to a subject of very great interest and importance, and upon having submitted to the Government advice which I think has been highly beneficial both to the country at large and to the institutions which were the subjects of this inquiry. I congratulate him upon the stage at which his labours have arrived, and I trust that he will live to see, and that before long, results much more important than any which have yet been obtained. It may be thought that a discussion of this kind, so soon after the publication of this Report, is in one sense premature. At the same time, I cannot regret that my hon. Friend has called attention to the subject. The prospect offered by blue-books, so formidable in their dimensions, is of a nature rather to repel than to attract those who are not acquainted with the exceedingly interesting, varied, and weighty matter which they contain, and a debate may direct attention to them earlier than they would otherwise obtain it. I will not follow my hon. Friend into what I may call his particular observations, either upon particular schools or upon particular studies or recommendations of the Commissioners. There are only two of his remarks upon which I will say a word. He stated that he felt himself to be a person of nothing less than revolutionary character in recommending the total abolition of the practice of Greek and Latin composition. I think he did submit that recommendation to the House like a man who knew that he was about to expose himself to a storm of reproach ; in fact, that he was partly alarmed even at the sound and echo of his own voice when such words proceeded from his lips. I do not think that his revolutionary doctrine is likely to have any injurious effect. There is too much conservative feeling in all of us who have been connected with these schools, whatever may be our politics or associations, to permit of our having any reason to apprehend that this House will give a very dangerous impulse to innovation. But I must record my dissent from that revolutionary doctrine of my hon. Friend. I entirely agree with him that the practice has been pushed to great excess, especially in forcing it upon those who are not qualified to profit by it; but for those who are qualified to profit by it I trust that it will always remain in vigour, and will continue to form, as it has hitherto formed, a great ornament, and a very remarkable characteristic of English education. I will also simply record my protest against the recommendation not only of my hon. Friend, but of the Commissioners also, as to modern languages. I entirely dissent from the doctrine of my hon. Friend with regard to the relative places of the Italian and German languages in the education of a gentleman. If you speak to me of an author or a student, the matter is totally different. In many countries there are no educated men but authors and students. But it is the proud distinction of England to have a very large body of highly educated gentlemen deeply imbued with the spirit of ancient and modern literature, although they are neither authors nor students, but value cultivation and literature for their own sakes, and for their humanizing and elevating influences on the mind. For that purpose, which I trust will always be made the first and paramount purpose of education in this country, I venture to think that the place my hon. Friend has given relatively to the two languages ought to be reversed. I apologize to the House for going into the discussion of detail, and shall simply make a few observations on the general position of the system. When Her Majesty's Government determined on the appointment of this Commission, my right hon. Friend the late Sir George Cornwall Lewis applied himself to the subject with all that delicate consideration for the feelings of others, and all that prudence and judgment for which he was distinguished, and ascertained that the mode of conducting the investigation—undoubtedly called for by the public interest—which would be most agreeable to the authorities of these schools was, by Commission, issued under the authority of the Crown. This would not possess any coercive powers or exercise anything even approaching to a moral force. To the composition of that Commission my right hon. Friend applied himself, and I am sure Gentlemen acquainted with the names which it included will agree with me in thinking that my right hon. Friend exercised a very sound judgment in selecting the individuals whom he was so fortunate as to bring together for that purpose. He did not confine his selections to any class or party, but sought, as my hon. Friend has said, to deal with the question as it ought to be dealt with—out of the mere circle of party politics. He applied to more than one Gentleman politically opposed to himself; and the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), and other Gentlemen sharing his political opinions, accepted the invitation, and devoted themselves in good earnest to the duty. I think it imperative not to allow the very first mention of this question in the House of Commons to pass without calling on this House to recognize what the Government feels to have been the laborious exertions of the Commission, which held between 120 and 130 meetings, most of them being attended by nearly all the Commissioners. And I must say, although there have been many occasions on which intelligent and enlightened public service has been rendered by Gentlemen appointed Commissioners under the nomination of the Crown, that I do not think any more signal instance could be quoted of the devotion of public men to an inquiry involving innumerable difficulties than that of the Commissioners whose Report now lies on the table. On the part of the Government, we feel ourselves deeply indebted for the invaluable assistance which they have given to the investigation of this question. It may not rank very high in the scale of mere political interest, but it does rank high in the opinion of many Members of both Houses of Parliament, who class our public schools among the great institutions of the country. The man, therefore, who endeavours here or elsewhere to destroy the essential character of those great public schools will find that he has undertaken a task scarcely less dangerous than that of their total subversion. It is a very remarkable fact, and one full of significance, that hardly less than a third of the whole available time of Parliament in the year 1854 was given to the consideration of the details of the Bill for the reform of the University of Oxford. I do not believe that to any other measure which passed this House since the Reform Bill and the Poor Law, Parliament has been willing to devote so much of its attention. The circumstance, therefore, is full of meaning, affording, as it does, a true measure of the importance attached by us all to the consideration of whatever is connected with the welfare of our great seats of education. My hon. Friend has made a Motion following upon his speech which was founded on the Report of the Commission, but I think my hon. Friend will see that the Motion and the Report are not in entire correspondence. The Motion, no doubt, expresses the view of my hon. Friend himself, but I think it would be altogether premature to ask the assent of this House to any Resolution involving a condemnation of the public schools. I do not understand such to be the sense of the Report of the Commissioners. They knew perfectly well that, in one sense, it was their duty to find fault, to examine patiently and with almost infinite detail whatever they thought might be susceptible of amendment, and to recommend improvements. Measuring praise or blame by the mere number of words or pages in their Report, it may therefore be construed into a condemnation. But that would be a very great mistake. In the main, the Commissioners have affirmed the principle on which the system of our great public schools is founded, and have also borne testimony to the fact that these schools have discharged the functions for which they were established. They have also, in the main, awarded due praise to those at the head of our public schools for the devotion and ability with which they have applied themselves to the discharge of their duty. I fully admit, and I confidently join my hon. Friend in the assertion, that the Commissioners have pointed out very serious existing evils and defects, and they have also, I hope, furnished us with the means of arriving, after due time and on full consideration, at sound and safe conclusions as to the mode of applying a remedy. My hon. Friend seems to be of opinion—an opinion which, perhaps, is shared by the public—that the principal source of existing mischiefs or defects is to be found in the misconduct, or, at all events, in the failure to perform their duty, on the part of teachers in our public schools. I do not believe anything could be more unjust than such a conclusion. With the exception, perhaps, of the tutors of the University—and I do not know whether they ought to be excepted—I do not know any class of men who perform their duties with greater zeal, assiduity, devotion, and laborious self-sacrifice than the teachers in our public schools. But the complaint is made, and with great truth, that the boys do not learn enough at our public schools. To parody what was written by Goldsmith—

And learn that little ill."

With the immense foundations which we possess, five times the amount of learning ought to be diffused in every branch. My hon. Friend left the matter as if nobody were to blame but the teachers and managers of the schools. He said, "the Universities find fault with the public schools because the young men come ill-prepared to the Universities." And that is quite true; but the public schools, in turn, have their complaints, and the whole affair revolves in a vicious circle. The parents complain that their children leave the Universities with their education incomplete; the Universities complain of inadequate preparation by the public schools; the public schools say the boys come ill-prepared from the private schools, and the private schools lay all the blame on the parents. And so it goes round and round. The point to be considered, however, is not how to shift the responsibility from one shoulder to the other, but how existing evils can be remedied. The Commissioners, it is fair to say, have not shrunk from this or any portion of the case; they have not hesitated to drive the matter home—to speak of the responsibilities of parents, and to lay blame where they think it necessary upon the inadequate manner in which parental authority is exercised among the wealthiest classes, both for the inculcation of knowledge and the maintenance of discipline. At page 40 of the Report, the Commissioners say—

"We have spoken plainly of the responsibilities of schools; we think it right to speak not less plainly of those of parents. Several of the masters whom we have examined have dwelt in strong terms on the ill-prepared and ignorant state in which boys are very frequently sent to school; we are assured that there is no improvement perceptible in this respect, but the reverse, and the Returns which have been furnished to us regarding the books read, and work done in the lower forms, and the ages of the boys in them, prove that these complaints are by no means without foundation. It is clear that there are many boys whose education can hardly be said to have begun till they enter, at the age of twelve or thirteen, or even later, a school containing several hundreds, where there can be comparatively little of that individual teaching which a very backward boy requires. In some degree this must, we fear, be ascribed to the deficiencies of preparatory schools, which too often fail to impart that thorough and accurate grounding which it should be their aim to bestow; but we do not hesitate to say that the fault rests chiefly with the parents."

There is the verdict and sentence of the Commissioners. And, therefore, if we criticize these public schools, let it not be supposed that we are aiming at imposing upon the eminent, able, and excellent men—for such they are—by whom these schools are managed, an undue portion of blame or responsibility. When we say that the fault lies with the parents, what does this mean? It means that we are living in an age in a great degree pampered in luxury, in which self-indulgence pervades more and more largely the habits of an ever-increasing class of society, the rapid extension of which we may see indicated by the continual addition, not only of large streets, but of whole quarters, in themselves great towns, to this metropolis; and a necessary consequence of that self-indulgence is a growing indisposition to the severe discipline which study and education invariably require. Now, there is the secret, it lies in that laxity, which is essentially connected with the signal prosperity and wealth of the country. And in one sense, in our attempts to improve the public schools, we are fighting against the age. The wealthier we become, the more difficult does it grow to apply to our children, or to realize to ourselves, the necessity of a severe self-discipline. I say this not to extenuate the mischief, but to show that the mischief is profound. The most remarkable example of this fact will be found in the relative condition of England and Scotland. In Scotland, almost the whole of the wealthiest class of young men and boys are sent to England to be educated, and, consequently, the Universities and schools have to deal with classes which are hardly represented in our Universities. The consequence is that the Universities of Scotland are conducted upon principles which would be absolutely powerless if applied to England. The students in our Universities are encouraged in their studies by a spirit of incessant competition and the hope of splendid rewards. In Scotland, however, there is no such encouragement. Go into St. Andrew's and Aberdeen where lads are working to a degree far exceeding that among ourselves. There is activity without competition, and one may almost say without reward. They carry on their work with a great degree of efficiency upon principles which in England would be found to be totally unequal to cope with the difficulties arising from greater wealth and increased luxury. That, Sir, I believe to be the great evil with which we have to contend; but do not let us suppose that the measure of the deficiencies of our schools or of our Universities is altogether to be found in the measure of their scholastic defects. I grant that attainments are most unsatisfactory in England; but we should, however, remember that there is no period attached to the history of the Universities or the public schools of England—I am speaking now with reference to the last four or five generations—when their instruction, in the opinion of the time, has answered so well, or when they have so effectually performed the work for which they were ordained, namely, the work of rearing the English gentleman, and the fitting him for the discharge of those varied duties which in this country have always been inseparable from his position in life. In deciding, therefore, upon the results which have been obtained from our Universities and public schools, do not let us forget, what is more important than their teaching power, their training power, a power which has been addressed to the end which the nation has recognized as desirable, and that end has been attained in a measure which the nation recognizes as sufficient. Whatever faults, therefore, we may be disposed to find with these institutions, and with whatever warmth we may be inclined to urge those objections, let us remember that the country owes to them a debt of gratitude for the work which they have performed. The mode only in which this work is to be done, requires much consideration. I feel confident, however, for my own part, that there will be no violent or precipitate legislation upon the subject. I think rather that Parliament will approach it in a spirit of mistrust. As regards the question of education, however, we cannot devote any consideration to the question without perceiving that a very great deal has yet to be done. There are now not less than eight or nine branches which ought to be included in the course of training at a public school, and of these very few can be dispensed with. First of all there is religious instruction, then comes classical study, a vindication of which the Commissioners have embodied in their Report—an argument drawn up in so philosophical and historical a spirit that it will confirm the country in the opinion with which they regard the classics as being the best foundation for subsequent study. Then come mathematics, natural science, English composition, history, geography, and the alternative of drawing or music, which the Commissioners have proposed. It is no easy matter to combine all these subjects in a country where it is necessary to add a corporal or physical education through the medium of national games and exercises. In days like these when the boat race between the Universities excites greater public interest than many more important events, those who endeavour unduly to restrict this branch of education will find that they have attempted a task which is perfectly hopeless. There is only one consideration which ought not to be forgotten, because it is of the greatest importance. It will be a fearful mistake if, in our desire to enlarge the career of education, we should for one moment forget that the main end of that education is the development of mind and matter, and if we should fall into the error of overloading the mind, rendering further growth and improvement absolutely impossible under the weight imposed upon it. I will not now trouble the House any further with the general subject; but state simply what I understand to be its practical bearing. When the House had to deal with the Universities there were four departments of inquiry, and I think they were all embraced in the Report of the original Commission. One was the Government, the constitution, and management of the governing bodies, and the remainder were the property, the discipline, and the studies. The two first were felt by Parliament to come within their province, but the two last they believed would be dealt with better if left to the management of those who were more qualified to regulate them. When Parliament does proceed to legislate upon this Report—because I will not conceive it possible that Parliament should defer the consideration of so valuable an inquiry longer than is absolutely necessary—it will, no doubt, again turn its attention to the constitution of the governing bodies and the management of their property. I need not, however, say that it has been impossible for Her Majesty's Government at this period of the year, and with the business now before them, to give the necessary time and consideration to these important volumes. Upon one point the Commissioners have not been able to give us any distinct authority or guidance, and that is with reference to the expediency of appointing a Parliamentary Commission in the case of public schools, as was done in the case of the Universities, for the purpose of superintending, guiding, and promoting those regulations, the adoption of which Parliament may deem to be advisable. That is a point upon which I do not presume to give an opinion, but it will necessarily have to be determined by Parliament. It will be impossible, however, to legislate upon the points I have adverted to during this Session. The experience we have had on former occasions I think makes that perfectly clear. We must, therefore, consider that, as far as any practical discussion is concerned, this question is postponed until another year. There is one minor point which the Government have under consideration, whether they should submit to Parliament a measure of the same character as has been, I think, introduced upon other occasions where similar considerations have been involved. The reform of the governing body is, perhaps, the most important subject that will come under the review of Parliament in connection with this inquiry of the Commissioners. These governing bodies are in some cases constituted in such a manner that their constitution is inextricably bound up with the life interest of their members. It has always been a sacred principle in our legislation upon this subject to pay the highest degree of respect to these life interests, and Parliament will probably not deviate from its usual practice in this case. It may, however, be right to go so far as to bring in a Bill by which all persons taking office in those governing bodies for the future shall be subject to the legislation of Parliament. That would prevent us from being tied up by absolute rights of a nature such as this House always recognizes in the holders of offices for life. With respect to all else, it will stand over, subject, however, to the duty of the Government, in concurrence, I hope, with all the Members of this House, to give their very careful consideration to this most important and profoundly interesting question. With regard to the discussion of to-night, although it may have no positive results, yet I think it will have the effect of enhancing the degree of interest which may be felt by the House and the country on a matter of so much importance.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, there is one observation which I wish to add to what has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But, first, I suppose that the hon. Gentleman who makes this Motion sees the propriety of not carrying it any further at present, inasmuch as this matter must be taken in hand, and properly so, by the Government, and also because the voluminous nature of the Report has precluded us from yet forming a judgment upon it. I have myself read the Report with great interest, but I own that I have not gone through all the evidence appended to it, and I should desire to refrain from expressing a premature opinion on this subject. The course, however, which the Government propose to adopt is, I think, the one most in harmony with the feeling of those who take a deep interest in this question—namely, that the matter should be left in the hands of the Government, in order that they may originate, say next Session, a proposition founded on this Report, when it is to be hoped that alike those concerned in these schools and Parliament itself, will be prepared to deal with the subject in the temper and spirit which befit it. The observation I wish to add to those addressed to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is this. I, like my right hon. Friend, am connected with one of those great public schools. I mean Eton. I happen to know from the highest authorities there—indeed, I have their permission to say so—that since this Report has been in their hands they have taken all the recommendations of the Commissioners seriatim into their consideration, with the view of introducing as many of the improvements therein suggested as they believe will be advantageous to the institution. If, therefore, the Government are to take this matter in hand during the recess, they would do well, as I have no doubt they will do, to put themselves in communication with the authorities of these schools as to the course they are inclined to pursue; and then we can have the matter placed before us in the fullest manner next Session, so as to enable Parliament to treat it satisfactorily. This is a most interesting question, and one of the most important that can be brought before the House; and for that, as well as for other reasons, I hope that the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press his Motion to a division, but will let the subject stand over until we are better prepared to give an opinion upon it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that he felt, although that debate was probably drawing to its conclusion, that he should be wanting in his duty if he did not say a few words on the part of the Commissioners, especially after the very handsome acknowledgment which their services had received from his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others. It was a very great gratification to his Colleagues and himself to find their labours treated with such kindness. When they undertook their task, they knew it was one of considerable labour and difficulty, and also one that would necessarily be somewhat of an invidious character. The Commissioners felt that many of them being connected with the schools which were to be the subject of their inquiry, and being bound up by personal ties of friendship with many of those who were charged with the conduct of those schools, it was a painful and invidious task to put those persons through the sort of ordeal and examination which had to be undergone. But they had endeavoured, he might safely say, to conduct their investigations throughout in a fair, a candid, and at the same time a friendly spirit. The Commissioners had thought that, on the whole, the interests of the schools with which they were themselves connected demanded that they should not attempt to hush up any matter, but that they should probe it to the bottom; that they should not out of a mistaken friendliness pass over things that called for inquiry; and although they had not evinced anything like a hostile spirit in the prosecution of their labours, yet a perusal of the evidence they had taken would, he thought, show that the investigation had been a searching one. He was bound to say, on behalf of those persons from whom they had obtained evidence, that the thanks of the Commissioners were due to them for the fair, candid, and noble spirit in which they had responded to their inquiries. The Commissioners had no power of compelling them to give evidence; yet everywhere the greatest readiness was shown to afford them information ; every question was discussed with them in the most open, frank, and friendly manner ; and this although many of the gentlemen thus appealed to were placed in a position of considerable embarrassment by the inquiry. He must also say, on their behalf, that the Commissioners did not find among the masters and managers of the schools any obstinate spirit of resistance to improvement. On the contrary, in every school there was an admission—and more than an admission—of the importance of progress, and of attempts to meet the demands of the day. He said more than an admission, because in most of the schools a great deal had been done of late years. He could quote numerous instances in proof of that assertion, but, as he could not mention all those schools in that discussion, he did not like to single out any one and give it a preference over the rest. He believed, however, that in every school to which the inquiry extended much had been done to introduce new subjects of study, to improve the methods of teaching, and generally to promote the welfare of the boys there. But the schools found themselves in a position in which they needed help and encouragement in order to do what they were capable of doing. The fact was, they had been attempting, under the restrictions imposed upon them by their founders in years gone by, to accommodate a new system to a machinery originally designed for the working of an old one ; and they, therefore, wanted the assistance of the Legislature to enable them to get free from those restrictions and to adopt the improvements which they were anxious to carry out. He earnestly hoped that in any legislation which the House might see fit to pass, care would be taken to observe the principle laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that that legislation should be confined to the removal of the restrictions under which the schools laboured, the improvement of the constitution of the governing bodies, and the dealing with endowments ; and that Parliament should not attempt to deal directly with the subjects of study or the management of the schools. If Parliament attempted to do that, he felt certain that it would do immense mischief, and utterly fail in its object. These public schools were national institutions, and had an important bearing on the formation of the national character ; and not only so, but they were

themselves the product of the national mind of Englishmen. They had grown up by degrees, and were not originally in their present form. The English mind did not want the lycées and gymnasias which existed in other countries, but schools for the moral, physical, and intellectual training of boys between the important years of twelve and eighteen, and which should make of those boys young men—men in every sense of the word. And if institutions of that kind had sprung up from the nucleus of the old grammar schools, it was not to be wondered at that they should now find themselves subject to restrictions which impeded their action. Let them then be set free, and enabled to accommodate the new studies lately forced upon them to the old learning for the promotion of which they were founded. Let them be placed in the hands of men with the requisite knowledge and fitness for the task, but let Parliament forbear from attempting to do that for which it was incompetent. That was his view of this question ; and the course which the Government proposed to take was exactly in conformity with that which he individually, and, he believed, the Commissioners generally, thought to be best. He should not be behaving fairly towards a particular school which had been mentioned in that debate if he did not make another remark. It was much to be regretted that the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff) should have used the language he did with respect to Westminster School, because hon. Members had not had time to read all the evidence, and did not know what the point was to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. His observations would only create an unfair prejudice against the institution in the House and with the public out of doors. It was a matter of great difficulty to determine the relations of boys in a school, to decide what was really fair and legitimate discipline among them, where fagging became tyranny, and discipline was turned into bullying ; for much depended upon the individual characters of different boys, and the different turn which might be given to representations of the same matter. The way in which that question had arisen at Westminster was as follows :—The Commission inquired into the system of fagging there, as at other schools, taking the evidence of young men who had recently left school, and upon the whole they heard nearly the same report as to fagging and discipline which was given at many of the other public schools. Later on a gentleman came to the Commission, and asked to be allowed to lay before them some statements of undue hardship and cruel treatment suffered by the younger boys under the fagging system at Westminster. That gentleman and his son were examined; the masters and some of the other boys were also examined; and the Commissioners came to the conclusion that although, to a certain extent, the charges made were modified and disproved by some of the subsequent evidence, yet there remained sufficient grounds for concluding that the system of discipline and fagging among the boys was in an unsatisfactory state, and that the junior boys had to undergo undue hardships. With regard to the gentleman and his son by whom those facts were elicited, it was an act of great moral courage on their part to make a statement which would render them unpopular and would be sure to subject them to sifting criticism. That statement opened the eyes of the Commission to much that they would not otherwise have noticed; and the result was that at other schools they examined the junior boys and asked searching questions on the subject of fagging. The boys answered those questions very nicely, and not at all in the same spirit of complaint in which the charges were brought forward at Westminster. But, at some other schools, facts came to light which, if they had been represented in that spirit, might have grown into formidable charges of bullying. The Commission found that to a great extent the evil admitted of a cure; but to apply that cure in the case of Westminster really required the help of that House. Its source and root was to be found in the insufficient accommodation provided for the boys and the insufficient provision of servants, the consequence of which was that the boys were not so much under the eyes of the masters as they should be, and the younger boys were required to do many things which elsewhere were performed, and which ought to be performed, by hired service. The difficulty in employing a sufficient number of servants and in providing suitable buildings arose from the want of funds, for the revenues of the school were not, like those of Eton or of Winchester, independent revenues, with which the governing body could deal as they pleased; they were caputular revenues in the hands of the Dean and Chapter, and it was a question how far those revenues were applicable to the support of the school. They had, indeed, been virtually taken out of the hands of the Dean and Chapter, or were about to be so taken, by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and it then became a question for Parliament how far those revenues could be devoted for improvements which were absolutely necessary at Westminster, if the school was to remain where it stood. The Commissioners could not abstain from pursuing the inquiry which he had mentioned, but he felt much pain in pursuing it, because what had been said was likely to be taken up and made a great deal of by persons who did not look carefully and thoroughly into the matter, and who would suppose that a case had been made out against the school, which might thus suffer injury. Now, he was convinced that the present Head Master at Westminster and his assistants were working hard to improve the school; and if the measures pointed out by the Commissioners for the improvement of study and of discipline were adopted, and the necessary funds were supplied, he believed that a great start would be made at Westminster, which would then resume the place formerly held by it among the public schools of this kingdom. Westminster had its disadvantages in being a London school, and in its connection with the caputular property. It deserved, therefore, to be dealt with tenderly, and he regretted that the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff) should have used such strong language in its condemnation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Government intended to introduce a Bill having reference to the constitution of the governing bodies and the question of endowments, and he asked whether the members of the late Commission were of opinion that another Commission should be appointed. Speaking for himself alone, he thought it would be utterly impossible to deal with this question satisfactorily unless a Commission were appointed to consult with the governing bodies, revise the statutes, and do away with unnecessary restrictions. Thus at Eton, among the old statutes was a provision that the Head Master should not ask any fee for the instruction of the 700 or 800 oppidians. For many years, however, it had been the practice of the Head Master to take fees, the old excuse being that he never demanded them, but took them when they were offered. More recently the last two Head Masters felt that it was absurd and improper to take any oath of this kind, and they had, therefore, been admitted to the Head Mastership without taking it. That, however, was a violation of the statutes. It was clear that the oppidans ought to pay fees like the rest; and that the statute ought to be repealed. Many such cases would be found in the statutes of different schools, and with those it would be necessary to deal. Having done this, and having effected by legislation some other improvements, which could not otherwise be carried out, he hoped Parliament would leave the management of the schools and the direction of the course of instruction to be dealt with by the governing bodies. He believed that the Commissioners had been the means of suggesting points to the masters of those schools and to the public which would prove very useful. They had recommended that each year there should be a publication of what was done in each school, and he believed that publication would lead to a general advance in the schools, at the same time that their independent character would not be destroyed. In conclusion, he had again to express his hope that the legislation which that House might adopt would effect the necessary improvements without destroying the great principle upon which our public schools had been conducted.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POOR RATES (IRELAND).—RESOLUTION.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he rose to move—

“That it was not just to charge on the poor rate in Ireland the expenses connected with the registry of voters and of births and deaths; and that it be an instruction to the Committee appointed on the subject of taxation in Ireland to consider how such expenses may be more equitably charged.”

He did not intend to give any opinion as to the quarter from which the money to pay those expenses ought to be procured. He would leave that to the Committee; but he might observe that in Ireland the poor rate was unequally assessed, and that he could not understand upon that principle, land, and land alone, should in Ireland be assessed for poor rates. Land ought to pay its share, but the entire burden ought not to be cast upon it. When he saw the many large manufacturing establishments in the country which, to a certain extent, might be said to create pauperism, and which owed their prosperity to the labour and intelligence of the working classes, he thought it hard that when they could no longer get anything out of their work people they should be allowed to throw the burden of maintaining them upon the land. He had no wish to relieve landowners from their share of the expense of maintaining the poor, but, under the present system, many persons had to pay poor rates for property of which they were only the nominal owners. It was impossible not to consider, in connection with that question, the emigration that had been going on in Ireland. He could not agree that that emigration had been caused by the peculiar nature of the tenure of land in Ireland. There were several causes at the root of it, but the most important of them was, perhaps, the liberal wages which the emigrants expected to receive in another country. Bad advisers led the ignorant peasantry to believe that if they went to America they would find that wealth, and honour, and luxury they could not procure at home. They had been induced by those advisers to go to America, and when they got there they were placed in the front ranks of the army, only to perish on the field of battle. He believed that England in her harvest times would feel the want of Irish labourers, but he denied that population was a necessary element of wealth to a country. In 1846 the population of Ireland was eight and a half millions. Even then Ireland could not be considered as nearly in so prosperous a state as either Scotland or England. In England there were two and a quarter acres for each person, in Ireland two and a half, and in Scotland seven and a quarter; and the valuation per head, according to the last census, was £5 10s. in England, £2 10s. in Ireland, and £4 10s. in Scotland. The Returns from the registries were valuable as matters of scientific research and as statistics, but as such they were of imperial rather than of local benefit, and the expense of obtaining them should form an item in the annual Estimates. He regretted to see the bone and sinew of a country leaving it. England would suffer more from the emigration from Ireland, than Ireland would. In former times England had done everything to discourage the trade of Ireland, and it was not unlikely that the day was approaching when that policy would react against herself. It might be said that he was seeking to disturb a new Act. His reply was, that the Act was passed under a misapprehension. When the House passed the Act, it was told by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland

(Sir Robert Peel), that while the poor rate in England was 4s. in the pound, in Ireland it was only 2s., and that consequently there would be no hardship in adding five-sixteenths of a penny to the Irish rate. The fact was, however, that the poundage upon land in England was 1s. 0½d.; in Scotland, 1s. 1¼d.; and in Ireland, 1s. 0¾d. If capital were assessed to its full value, the poundage in England would be 5½d.; in Scotland, 6¾d.; and in Ireland, 7¼d. Moreover, the right hon. Baronet omitted to inform the House what a heavy expenditure—amounting in the aggregate to £20,000—would be thrown upon the Irish Boards of Guardians for providing the machinery of registration. It might also be said that the law was the same in all the three kingdoms; but the fact was not so, for in England and Scotland, where the poor rate was or might be levied on means and substance, the assessment rested upon a broader basis than in Ireland. He hoped that if the right hon. Baronet could not accede on the part of the Government to that part of the Motion which asserted that it was not just to place those charges upon the poor rate, he would at all events agree that it should be an instruction to the Committee on Irish taxation to inquire into the matter involved in the second part. Small as the sum annually asked for to pay for the registration of voters was, it gave rise on each occasion that it was brought forward to more ill-feeling than any other money question which came before Boards of Guardians.

MR. HENNESSY begged to second the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not just to charge the Poor Rate in Ireland with the expenses connected with the Registry of Voters and Births and Deaths; and that it be an Instruction to the Committee appointed on the subject of Taxation in Ireland, to consider how said expenses may be more equitably charged."
—(Sir Harvey Bruce.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR ROBERT PEEL remarked, that the hon. Baronet, in referring to emigration and other kindred subjects, had travelled beyond the limits of his notice. There was nothing exceptional, as regarded Ireland, in charging the poor rate with the expenses connected with the registration of voters. In England the expense was borne by the local taxation; in counties by what was called the public stock of the county; and in boroughs by the poor rate. Neither was there anything exceptional in the manner in which the registration of births and deaths was charged on the poor rate in Ireland. A feeling seemed to have grown up of late that there was something unfair in putting this expense on the poor rate. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast, however, appeared to have informed the Belfast Board of Guardians that there was something exceptional in these expenses being placed on the poor rate, and they had sent circulars to the greater number of Unions throughout Ireland, calling attention to the subject. He had received a letter on the subject from the Kilkenny Board of Guardians, and it was evident that they derived the information which induced them to make representations to the Government, from Belfast. They took an entirely wrong view of the matter. In concert with him, the Poor Law Commissioners in Dublin had written a letter pointing out that these expenses were paid in Ireland as in England, partly by local and partly by general taxation, and the hon. Baronet, therefore, was under an erroneous impression in supposing that there was anything exceptional in the manner in which those expenses were charged in Ireland. As to the rate for the relief of the poor, it was heavier in England than in Scotland, and heavier in Scotland than in Ireland. As to referring the subject to the Committee—they had already before them the prospect of a long and arduous inquiry, and it would be hardly fair, without their consent, to extend the range of their duties. He would consult with the Chairman, and if the Committee were willing to undertake that new duty, the Government would have no objection.

MR. HENNESSY said, that subject was regarded with great interest in Ireland. A strong impression was growing up there among the people that they were grievously overtaxed, and that the Government was perpetually bringing in new Bills which in some way or other increased their taxation. At the same time, when any proposition was made to treat the poor more liberally in Ireland, the Government pointed at once to the present amount of the poor rates as an argument against any such reform. He was by no means satisfied with the arguments of the right hon.

Baronet. The truth was, that those various extraneous charges on the poor rate in Ireland constituted a fraud on the poor. He believed it was perfectly competent for the Committee upstairs to inquire into that question without any instructions, and, under the circumstances, he would advise his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

RETIREMENT IN THE ROYAL MARINES.

RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that at a moment when it was understood that a large increase of pay was about to be granted to some officers in the Royal Navy, the House would probably not be indisposed to do an act of justice to the officers of the Royal Marines. He would not suggest the vote of a large sum of money to that distinguished corps, but would only ask the payment of a sum of money to which he considered the officers of that corps to be entitled. In 1854 a Royal Commission recommended that £60,000 a year should be applied to encourage retirement in the Line, and £48,000 in the Engineers and Artillery. In the same year the Admiralty obtained an Order in Council for the application of £35,000 to a similar purpose in connection with the Royal Marines, who were not included in that arrangement, they being not under the War Office, but under the Admiralty. That force then consisted of 12,000 men, but was subsequently raised to 15,000 and 18,000—the latter being its present strength. A corresponding increase had, of course, taken place in the number of officers. A difficulty had arisen as to the means of apportioning the £35,000, and to the present day the full amount had never been expended in any year. In fact, the £29,000 previously applied to the same object had not been exceeded. Thus there had been a saving of £5,000 or £6,000 each year, which should have been devoted to promoting retirement in the Marines. The Marine officers thought that, as their corps had been increased, the amount of money devoted to the encouragement of promotion should be increased in a like proportion. The number of retired general officers was only ten, and that bore no proportion to the number of retired officers of the same grade in other regiments. It had been suggested that the Admiralty should slightly increase the number of retired general officers in that corps. That course of action would help to restore the even flow of promotion, which was now wanting. It had been said that the senior officers of the Marine corps were exceedingly efficient, and that to promote them to be generals would be to dispense with the services of four officers of distinguished merit. Distinguished though those officers might be, however, he had no doubt that others of equal merit would be found in the lower grades of the corps. But, whatever course the Government might deem it desirable to adopt in the matter, it would, he thought, be unwise to give the Marines reason to think that they were ill-treated while the Engineers and the Artillery enjoyed the full benefit of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and that the country was, as it were, withholding from them a sum of only about £5,000 a year, which would encourage that flow of promotion which was so beneficial to the service. His noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty might possibly say that he could find no officers who would retire; but, with a little of that dexterous management which he possessed in so remarkable a degree, he might discover some persons in the Marines who would avail themselves of the advantages of £4,000 a year surplus. At all events, instead of making such an excuse to the House of Commons, he had better tell it to the very distinguished corps of which he was speaking. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House would view with satisfaction the distribution of the full sum awarded by the Order in Council of 1854 for the retired Officers in the Royal Marines, as it would tend to expedite the necessary promotion in that valuable Corps,"—(Sir John Hay,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it was a mistake to suppose that the number of retired general officers in the Marines was only ten. The number was actually thirty-nine. He trusted the House would not accede to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could not admit that there had been any misapprehension as to the terms of the Order of Council of 1854. That Order had been issued because at that time promotion in the Marines was excessively stagnant, and it became necessary that facilities should be given for the purpose of procuring a proper flow of promotion. The Government were authorised by the Order, to allow a certain number of officers to retire on certain conditions, and they had carried out the order; but his hon. and gallant Friend contended that a sum of £35,000 having been granted, it ought to have been expended irrespective of the conditions. Now, he could quite understand that it might be expedient, in the event of promotion in the corps of Marines becoming stagnant, that the Government should come forward and propose some plan by which a proper flow of promotion should be established; but it was not true that any such stagnation at present existed. Last year no doubt there was stagnation; and in all seniority corps, when promotion went by seniority, they might rely upon it periods of stagnation must necessarily take place. But was that the case with the Marines? In the year 1862 no less than thirteen captains were promoted. His hon. and gallant Friend, moreover, seemed to suppose that the Government could force the officers of Marines to retire, and it was perfectly true that, under the Order in Council, officers commanding divisions of the Royal Marines were entitled and could be compelled to retire on attaining the age of sixty, unless the Admiralty were satisfied that the discipline of the division was such that they might with advantage continue in command. As things stood, however, the colonels-commandant were active men, and the Admiralty could not compel them to retire. Of the £35,000, the sum allowed per annum for retirements, £30,400 was the sum expended; but it was quite possible that another year the full sum of £35,000 might be laid out. What his hon. and gallant Friend wanted, as far as he could understand, was, that an additional number of Generals should be created in the Marines; and he, for one, should be glad, having the greatest regard for the corps, as one of the important branches of the navy, to do anything which could advance its interests. He was not, at the same time, prepared to say that the Government could recommend any new Order in Council, and he hoped the House would not agree to the Motion. The colonels-commandant, he might add, were in the position that, when they came to hold their high rank, they were not liable to be called upon to serve abroad, whereas officers holding high rank in the army did not enjoy a similar privilege, but were often obliged to go on foreign service and to unhealthy stations.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that the practice still prevails of transporting Convicts and Vagrants from the Channel Islands to Southampton and other southern seaports. For a long series of years a custom had prevailed of deporting the criminal population of the Channel Islands to the southern ports of England, the peace and security of the inhabitants of which were thereby endangered. A memorial forwarded to the Government from the Mayor and corporation of Southampton stated that, within the last ten years, upwards of 1,000 persons convicted of housebreaking, robbery, and other felonies had been banished from Jersey and Guernsey and landed on the shore of Southampton and permitted to go at large, and that vagrants had also been landed there in like manner, by which proceeding the amount for the casual poor was increased. In a book written by one of the witnesses examined before the Royal Commission of 1847 on the criminal law of Jersey and Guernsey, it was stated that burglary was punished by deportation to England for a term of years, and the offenders were shipped off one or two at a time, lest the landing of many convicts at once among the peaceable inhabitants of the neighbouring ports should give rise to complaint. Convicts, who had been sentenced to three, five, and seven years' imprisonment, were sent to any part of England which they might choose, while persons charged with minor offences were often induced to quit the Islands before trial, their travelling expenses being paid, and they ordinarily went to Southampton. Practically, that brought the evil of transportation home to our very doors. Within the last two or three years there had been more than thirty cases of persons who had left the Channel Islands either in consequence of their poverty, or from being suspected of crimes, and become chargeable on the poor rates of Southampton. He trusted the Government would take some step to put down such a monstrous state of things?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that not long ago he received a memorial, which had been addressed by the corporation of Southampton to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, in reference to the practice which they said extensively existed of sending persons convicted of crime from Jersey and Guernsey to this country. There was, however, only one case mentioned in the memorial—namely, that of David Brooke, who was said to have been banished from Guernsey ten years ago for threatening violence to those who had refused to relieve him, and for assaulting the officer who took him into custody. He transmitted the memorial to Guernsey and Jersey, with a request for information as to the practice which prevailed. He had not yet received an answer from Jersey, but he had from Guernsey, and so far as that island was concerned, it afforded a most complete answer. The Governor referred the matter to the bailiff, and he found that the register of criminal proceedings in the island did not contain the name of David Brooke, except as far back as the 26th of December, 1839, when a person of that name, who no doubt was the same individual, was brought before the court. It also appeared that in 1840 the corporation of Southampton sent a memorial nearly similar to the present one to Lord Normanby, the then Secretary of State, and that the ten years spoken of in the last memorial preceded 1840, and went back to the reign of William IV. He was also informed that no native of Guernsey had been transported from the island since 1840. He, therefore, thought that the hon. and learned Member had been wholly misinformed. If, however, he desired further information on the subject, the most satisfactory way of obtaining it would be to move for the production of the memorial and the correspondence which had taken place.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN UNIONS (IRELAND).—RESOLUTION.

MR. MACEVOY said, he rose to move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should now adopt the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1858, which recommended Her Majesty's Government to take into consideration the claims of Ireland to a grant of the half-cost of Medical Officers in Unions, with the view of providing for the same in future, as is now the practice in England and Scotland."

The hon. Gentleman proceeded to detail the various ways in which the burden on the land had been relieved in England, and the poor rate made lighter, as recommended by the late Sir Robert Peel in 1846, and contended that it might be inferred from the speech of the right hon. Baronet on that occasion, that the same measure of relief as regarded the cost of the Union medical officers which had been extended to England and Scotland, would have been extended to Ireland also had the state of the law in Ireland admitted of it at the time. The abolition of the Corn Laws, which had been a great boon to England and Scotland, had proved injurious to Ireland, and as the interests of the latter had been sacrificed to the good of the rest of the United Kingdom, that gave additional weight to the claim for that modicum of relief which he now asked for the Irish ratepayers. The payment of the Irish constabulary out of the Consolidated Fund ought not to be thought sufficient reason for refusing to accede to this request. Another argument was, that Ireland did not contribute towards the expense of the county and borough police of England. The fact was, however, that one-fourth of the whole pay and clothing of the police force of England was now paid out of the Consolidated Fund. It should also be remembered that, although the cost of the Irish constabulary was paid out of the Consolidated Fund, yet that the constabulary now discharged the duties of revenue police, whereby a saving of £15,000 a year occurred. It was evidently the intention of the late Sir Robert Peel to place Ireland in an equally good position as England and Scotland, and he trusted that the Government would consent to carry out the recommendation of the Committee of 1858.

MR. HENNESSY begged to second the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "In the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should now adopt the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1858, which recommended Her Majesty's Government to take into consideration the claims of Ireland to a grant of the half-cost of Medical Officers in Unions with the view of providing for the same in future as is now the practice in England and Scotland,"—(Mr. MacEvoy.)

—instead thereof.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that in the year 1860 the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Dawson) brought that subject under the notice of the House, on which occasion his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Cardwell) gave what appeared to him to be a satisfactory answer to the demand then made. The late Sir Robert Peel, in consequence of the financial changes introduced in the Budget of 1846, relieved the local rates of Ireland from the payment of £350,000 on account of the constabulary, the whole cost of which he placed on the Consolidated Fund; but he made no corresponding alleviation in England and Scotland. In Ireland there were now 717 dispensary districts and 764 medical officers, and the whole cost of keeping up this machinery was £75,000. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. MacEvoy) asked that Ireland should be relieved of half that sum; but the relief afforded to Ireland by the payment of the constabulary was ten times greater than the relief now sought. No doubt when the late Sir Robert Peel removed the burdens of taxation, which were then so much complained of, he considered that he was doing what he thought sufficient. No positive promise was made in 1846 that one-half of the cost of the medical unions should be borne by the Consolidated Fund. The matter was one which lay with the Treasury rather than the Irish Government, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer chose to relieve the local taxation of Ireland to the extent of £37,000 a year by paying half the cost of the dispensary officers, he, for one, should rejoice. He had no authority in the matter, and the Treasury might have good reasons for maintaining the present state of things. After that assurance on his part—which, however, he would admit did not amount to much, except that he sympathized with the hon. Gentleman—he trusted that he would withdraw the Motion.

MR. MONSELL said, that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not spoken with his usual confidence, and did not appear to think he had a very good case. For himself he did not entertain the least doubt, from the speech of the late Sir Robert Peel, that if medical relief had been conducted in Ireland on the same principles as at present, the relief for which his hon. Friend prayed would then have been granted. On what grounds did Lord Devon's Commission recommend that the constabulary should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund? Because all the appointments were vested in the Lord Lieutenant. In England, however, the patronage rested with the local authorities. The Report further stated that the Irish constabulary was a disciplined and armed force, stationed in regular barracks. In other words, the ground on which that Commission recommended that the whole expense of the Irish constabulary should be borne by the Consolidated Fund was that that force was almost a part of the regular army. The Government had no more right to call upon the ratepayers to pay for it than they had to call upon them to pay for a regiment that might happen to be quartered with them. The analogy between the English and Irish police forces, therefore, entirely failed, and there remained no colourable pretence for rejecting the Motion of his hon. Friend.

COLONEL DUNNE said, the Irish police were rather a gendarmerie than a police force. But he contended that the cost of the Irish police force was really borne by the people of Ireland. Ireland ought not to be taxed for an object which was not equally the subject of a tax in England and Scotland.

MR. BAGWELL said, that the reason given by Sir Robert Peel for not dealing with the charge for medical relief in Ireland as it was dealt with in England and Scotland was that the law with respect to medical relief in that country was different from the law in Great Britain, and showed that if the law had been the same he would have dealt in a similar manner with the charge. The whole cost of the Irish constabulary was placed on the Consolidated Fund, in order to induce the Irish Members not to oppose the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846. The law of Ireland with respect to medical relief was now the same as that of Great Britain, and the charge ought, therefore, to be provided for in the same manner in all the three kingdoms. As to the police of Ireland, it was now essentially a military force. He thought it would be unworthy of the English Government to resist such a Motion as the present. It was a simple matter of justice that ought to be conceded.

MR. PEEL said, that the charge for medical relief in England and Scotland was not placed upon the Consolidated Fund to give relief to local taxpayers, but partly to compensate the agricultural interest for the difficulties to which it was believed that they would be subjected by the free importation of corn, and partly to give the Government a share in the appointment and superintendence of the medical officers, in order that a defective system might be improved. Neither of those reasons existed in Ireland at the present moment. There was no question of compensation, and the dispensary officers performed their duties in a most satisfactory manner. As regarded the relief to the ratepayer, Ireland received much greater compensation by the transference of the entire constabulary cost to the Consolidated Fund. He thought that if the claim now put forward had been a good one it would have been considered in the year 1852, when the charge for these officers was first placed upon the poor rates.

Mr. HENNESSY said, that before the House divided he should like to answer the only two Ministers who had spoken upon the subject by quoting the words of a distinguished man, to whom they ought to pay a little respect. The late Sir Robert Peel said—

"I believe it will be an immense advantage to place the police force of Ireland directly under the control of the Executive, to prevent the possibility of all interference by local bodies, to make the police as perfect a system as possible, excluding all power of local nomination or local interference, taking the whole conduct, in fact, under the Executive Government, and, in order to make the system as perfect as possible, paying the police out of the public treasury."

Sir Robert Peel had in view an important object of Imperial policy, and to carry it out he was willing that the country should bear the expense. But that question had nothing whatever to do with the Motion brought forward by his hon. and gallant Friend. It was one of a class which had become rather frequent of late, in which the Irish Members asked for the same justice that was extended to England, and he trusted it would be pressed to a division.

Sir HERVEY BRUCE said, that when Sir Robert Peel refrained originally from extending the income tax to Ireland, additional taxation was imposed on stamps and spirits. Those charges had been maintained, although the income tax, since added, produced a revenue of £700,000.

Sir GEORGE GREY begged to remind the House that the whole subject of Irish taxation had been referred to a Select Committee. It would, therefore, be unfair to deal separately with items of taxation in the manner proposed by the present Motion.

Mr. Peel

LORD JOHN BROWNE begged to remind the Government that in the English Estimates a sum of nearly £300,000 was included for the support of County Courts in England, whereas the whole expense of such costs in Ireland was paid out of fees.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—DUCHIES OF SCHLESWIG AND HOLSTEIN.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he rose to put Questions connected with the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The subject was one in which a deep interest necessarily was felt by the people of this country, and a strong desire was expressed to obtain explanations leading to a right understanding of the merits of the conflict, and the course which England ought to pursue. It had been alleged that the States of Holstein formally thanked the King of Denmark when the change was made in the order of succession to that Duchy. The fact was that the States of Holstein never did express any opinion of the kind, for the question had never been submitted to them. Holstein was a constitutional country, and the change ought never to have been made without obtaining the assent of the representatives of the Staaten. The Staatscandeler, the Royal organ in Denmark, gave information on this subject; and in it were laid down the functions of the States of Holstein and Schleswig. It said—

"With regard to those affairs which fall under the official direction of our Ministry in the Duchy of Schleswig, no changes in legislation, with the exception of laws merely provisional, shall be made, without the assent previously obtained of the Provincial Estates of the Duchy, and in the arrangements respecting them the vote of the Provincial Assembly shall be expressly stated. With regard to the affairs of Holstein, which fall under the official direction of our Ministry in the Duchies of Holstein and Lauenburg, no changes in the legislation shall take place unless sanctioned by a previous vote of the Provincial Estates of the Duchy. And in the arrangements respecting them the vote of the Provincial Assembly shall be expressly stated."

cluded from discussing the first six paragraphs; and when the States of Holstein proceeded to consider the rest of the Constitution, they decided by forty to five that they should protest that those paragraphs had no validity, because they had not been submitted to them. That the States had a right to be consulted was evident both from the extract he had read and also from the promise of the King of Denmark, that all parts of his dominions should enjoy equal rights and privileges. Holstein and Schleswig were constitutional States. Their laws could not be changed without the assent of the representatives of the people, and because this change was effected without their assent the present horrid war was raging. Schleswig and Holstein, in ancient years, were united in one common Diet, which in 1460 elected the head of the house of Holstein-Oldenburg, Duke. The Sovereignty was elective till 1616, when the common Diet at Schleswig decided that primogeniture in the male line of succession should be the law of the Duchies, which law was in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg. By the ancient law he should now be their ruler. The King of Denmark promised in 1849-50 that the Duchies should be placed on the same constitutional footing with Denmark in all respects; therefore, in good faith to the subjects of the Duchies, the law altering the succession ought to have been submitted to the States of Holstein and Schleswig. A law which took away a man's birthright without his consent was an act of injustice. Excepting the old Duke Christian none of the Augustenburgs were asked to consent. He received £340,000 for estates that were worth £600,000, and he at the same time agreed not to interfere with any regulation of the succession which the King of Denmark might by legal means carry into effect. Vattel said that treaties were void that violated the rights of third parties. The alteration in the succession was declared to be law by the arbitrary will of the King of Denmark. The question was discussed in the Diet of Frankfurt in 1846, when the rights of the Augustenburgs were acknowledged. It was said that the movement in the Duchies was not spontaneous but prompted by agents from Germany. An hon. Gentleman, whom they all respected, though they did not often agree with his opinions—the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner)—said he believed that but for those agents from Germany, the great bulk of the population in the Duchies would have willingly recognized the King of Denmark. He was surprised to hear the hon. Member make that assertion. There was certainly a despatch from Sir Andrew Buchanan to Earl Russell, in which it was stated he had been informed that there was good reason to believe "that not less than 2,000 agents of the National Verein had been sent into the Duchy to agitate and excite the people. A system of terror also prevailed, which few persons were able to resist." [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members cried "Hear," which showed that they believed the statement. Now what he wanted to know was, on whose authority that had been stated. He believed it to be entirely untrue—absolutely, utterly, and totally untrue. Would any British agent declare that he believed 2,000 agents were sent from Germany in order to excite the people in the Duchies against the King of Denmark? He demanded the authority on which that statement was made. Lord Russell, in writing to Lord Cowley, used similar language. He said—

"It was not till numerous democratic agents of the German National Verein swarmed into the Holstein villages that the rural population showed any indisposition to the Government of the King of Denmark. Even now the inhabitants of the villages show little inclination voluntarily to swell the democratic flood of German invasion."

The noble Lord sitting in Downing Street could not have known that, and he wanted to know the name of the agent who told him so. Mr. Grosvenor was sent for the express purpose of ascertaining the opinions of the inhabitants of Schleswig and Holstein, and what did that gentleman say? Mr. Grosvenor said that, although the agitation might be suppressed by the superior forces of the Great Powers, and Schleswig and Holstein might continue under the rule of Denmark, yet no satisfactory solution of the question could be obtained by those means, and the agitation would never cease until the people of Schleswig and Holstein were freed from the yoke of Denmark; and yet the people of this country were told that there was no spontaneous movement in the Duchies, notwithstanding the evidence furnished by our diplomatic agents, who were responsible for their statements. The evidence of Mr. Consul Ward and Vice Consul Rainalds was in the same direction. It was also true that Her Majesty's Government had been incessantly urging the Government of Denmark to perform their promises to the Duchies, and yet what was now the state of affairs? Instead of compelling Denmark to fulfil those promises, it was doubtful whether we were not about to go to war in favour of Denmark, because she had not performed them. That appeared to him to be a curious non sequitur. If courage and endurance were alone to be the test, if our sympathies were to be enlisted on the side of the Power that showed the greatest endurance and most wonderful self-devotion, he should certainly say that we ought to support the Danes. But that was not the principle upon which we should be governed at that moment; he should be in favour of going to war in favour of Denmark. But this country ought only to go to war for a cause that was just. If we were to take part with the oppressed, we should have to take part with the German population of the Duchies, who had been abominably oppressed. He did not object to the Eider-Dane party, but he did object to the mode in which they sought to obtain their ends. He also sympathized with the brave Danish army and the self-devotion they had displayed, but he thought that great responsibility rested upon the Danish Government, who consigned those gallant soldiers to death, in a cause in which she was the original transgressor, and in order to conciliate the mob of Copenhagen. It was not even for the advantage of Denmark that the provinces, which had suffered so much from her oppressive rule, should remain under her Government. There were instances of countries which, after losing portions of their territory, had nevertheless increased in population—as in the case of Saxony, Belgium, and Holland. He would impress upon the House that the only proper course to adopt would be to refer the settlement of the question to the inhabitants of the Duchies themselves, who should be invited to express their opinions upon it in a proper and constitutional manner. He should conclude by asking the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to state to the House—

“Whether he has reason to believe that the States of Holstein formally thanked the King of Denmark for what he had done in altering the succession; and, if so, on what authority he entertains that belief?”

Whether the intimation, in Despatches 709 and 784, that the movement in the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein in favour of separation from Denmark was not spontaneous, rests on the authority of any agents of the British Government; and if he will lay upon the table any Documents or Despatches on these subjects?

Sir Harry Verney

And, to move an Address for Copy of the Answers received from the Governments to whom invitations were addressed to attend the Conference now sitting in London?”

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he wished to obtain from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs some further information, his desire for which was prompted by a feeling less Teutonic than that which animated the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney). That hon. Baronet referred to the spontaneity of the movement in Schleswig and Holstein; but the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary in replying ought to take into consideration not only what he heard from British agents, but what was proved from the undoubted circumstances of the case. Immediately contiguous to the Duchies was a German population of 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 all anxious for annexation. He would not do the Danish Government in Schleswig the injustice of comparing it with the English rule in Ireland when the penal code was in force; but since that code had been abolished, and nothing but the remembrance of it remained to excite disaffection, what would have been our position if Ireland had been placed between France and England? Although the power of England bore a much larger proportion to that of France than Denmark bore to Germany, would any one, under the circumstances supposed, have maintained that a movement in Ireland against English rule was spontaneous? The hon. Baronet declined to trust unnamed British agents, but would he believe such persons as Count von Bismark and M. Rechberg? The British Minister, writing on the 5th of December, said that M. von Bismark told him that—

“Money was also collecting throughout Germany for the Prince of Augustenburg; and, while offices had been opened in Hamburg and in several other States, to raise men for his Highness's service, arms, uniforms, and accoutrements were preparing for their use. Free corps might, therefore, soon enter Holstein and proclaim his Highness as Duke of Schleswig-Holstein. M. de Bismark did not doubt that the King of Denmark might be able to maintain his authority against any opposition which might thus be offered to it; but if his Majesty were obliged to employ force, many of the Schleswig-Holstein sympathizers who would fall in any conflict which might take place between them and his Majesty's troops might be lawless adventurers, but others might be enthusiastic young men, whose death would increase the excitement now prevailing in Germany to a degree which it would be impossible for the Governments to resist.”

Thus M. von Bismark was of opinion that, but for those German sympathizers, some of whom were lawless and some enthusiastic, the King of Denmark might have maintained his authority even in Holstein. Yet, in the face of that statement, the hon. Baronet wondered upon what authority the English Government had conceived the notion that the movement had been stimulated from without. So, again, as to Schleswig, Lord Bloomfield, on the 18th of February, wrote as follows :

"Count Reechberg assured me also, that as far as he could judge of public opinion from the various reports that had reached the Imperial Government, there appeared to exist great indifference in the Duchy of Schleswig generally, as to the Prince in whose hands the governing power should be placed. In fact, said His Excellency, if it were not for the activity displayed by the agents of some of the small German Powers, little would be heard on the subject of the Duke of Augustenburg ; but the instant an agitating agent, following in the rear of the advancing army, contrived to get two or three insignificant people together to join in the cry for the Prince of Augustenburg, it was immediately telegraphed to all parts of Germany that the Prince had been proclaimed.

"His Excellency added that these reports were totally untrue as representing an expression of the feelings of the mass of the population, who did not care for, and had certainly not evinced any partiality for, the Duke of Augustenburg."

In the face of those statements the House was told that the movement was spontaneous. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) did not regard the present as being the occasion for going into the charges of broken faith which had been made against Denmark, and would, therefore, merely express his belief that those charges were unfounded. There was only one topic more to which he desired to advert. If the sympathy expressed by Germany for the people of Schleswig Holstein were real, it deserved their respect ; but if, on the contrary, that sympathy were merely adopted as a pretence for the purposes of self-aggrandizement, it must be viewed on all sides with mistrust and aversion. Now, the true motives of a people were sometimes, perhaps, to be discovered rather in popular songs than in state-papers. And it was therefore worth while to observe that the favourite German song on this subject began with the words, "Schleswig Holstein, sea-girt land !" What had its being sea-girt to do with the matter ? An oppressed nationality did not deserve aid more if it were maritime than if it were inland. But it might be a much more profitable business to help it if its territory contained a port which was coveted by the sympathizers. Considering, too, what

Austria had done in Hungary, in Venetia, and in Galicia, considering the part which Prussia had taken last year with reference to the Poles, and considering the opinion expressed last December by Herr Von Bismark, that there would never be any peace between Germany and Denmark so long as Denmark permitted the continuance of democratic institutions, he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) could feel no sympathy, and he believed the House would feel none, with any pretended desire of those who were now attacking Denmark for the promotion of liberty.

MR. LAYARD said, he did not believe, if he might judge from the tenour of the House, that hon. Members were desirous of a long speech upon the subject, especially as a more solemn discussion was now going on upon that very important affair. He would, therefore, confine himself to the questions asked by his hon. and gallant Friend. He must, however, observe, that the doctrine laid down by the hon. Baronet, that the fact of a kingdom being as populous after its dismemberment as it was before was an excuse for its dismemberment, was most extraordinary, and one which he did not believe would be generally accepted. His hon. Friend had not accurately quoted the words he had made use of on the occasion of a former debate upon this subject. He had no doubt that his hon. Friend would remember that he was pointing out how dangerous it was for the House in discussing questions involving, as they did, the most comprehensive principles of International Law, to come to a hasty decision upon those questions, and that those matters had been discussed by some of the most celebrated legists of Europe. He also mentioned the powers of the States of Schleswig and Holstein. Those States were constitutional Parliaments, which, according to some, having the power of giving an opinion, and exercising an influence, upon any change in the succession, while others maintained that the only questions which they could claim to discuss were connected with matters of mere local interest. His hon. Friend had assumed that evening, what he regarded as very doubtful, the power of the States to discuss a change in the succession. He would remind his hon. Friend that the question was surrounded by too many difficulties to allow of its being decided by a mere ipse dixit. He (Mr. Layard) had said that others had asserted that the States had not only discussed the question, but had virtually returned thanks to the late King of Denmark for the settlement of the succession. That statement was made upon the authority of a report of the Holstein States on the modification of the Constitution which was adopted by the Assembly, dated December, 1853, and printed in the Holsteinische Stände Zeitung. It contains the following words :—

“ The welfare of the people, the preservation or the loss of the greatest earthly benefits, not only for us, but also for the coming generations, depends upon a proper arrangement of the mutual relations between the different territories which now are united under the sceptre of His Majesty the King, and which also shall remain united as long as it pleases Providence, in accordance with an order of succession which has been fixed by our present Sovereign, with the assent of the great European Powers.”

That Report had not been communicated officially to Her Majesty's Government, and he could not, therefore, lay it upon the table of the House, but he believed it to be authentic. His hon. Friend next proceeded to say that he was inaccurate in stating that the Diet did not object to the change in the succession. What he did say was, that up to the time of the death of the late King the question of the succession had not been made an element in the discussions which were then being carried on by that body in reference to the two Duchies; but that, on the contrary, when Earl Russell made his proposal of December, 1862, that proposal was accepted by all the German Powers and the Diet as one that was perfectly satisfactory. If Denmark had accepted that proposal, that difficult and important question would have been settled. That statement he now repeated. His hon. Friend had next asked upon what ground the statement was made that the expression of feeling in the two Duchies in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg was not a spontaneous one. The very despatch by Sir Andrew Buchanan, quoted by the hon. Baronet as an authority for his statement, that the expression of feeling was spontaneous, proved that it was brought about by the agents of the National Verein. The Report also of Mr. Consul Rainalds, which had been quoted by his hon. Friend, would not bear him out in the opinion which he had founded upon it, as the following extract would show :—

“ First, I would state that I never once heard His Majesty the King of Denmark spoken of but with respect and affection, while I did hear expressions to the effect that if he possessed the power he had the will to make his subjects happy and content. I met with but very few persons who admitted that they desired separation from the kingdom of Denmark or union with Prussia or Germany, and these few were confined to strong partisans of the nobility (ritterschaft) and large landed proprietors; but so well are they aware that the population of the country do not share their sentiments, that they only communicated them when warm in argument and by mistake. The nobility and landed gentry formerly held Court and diplomatic appointments from Denmark, from which they are now excluded, and entertain, perhaps, hopes of being similarly employed if union with Germany could be effected. But these two classes have, nevertheless, by their intelligence, wealth, and connections abroad, a very considerable direct and indirect influence on the German population of the Duchy, which they use with the ostensible purpose of securing justice to the people and an union of the two Duchies. The wish for a legislative and administrative union with Holstein was generally expressed among the intelligent persons of the populations in the towns, but only to a small extent among those inhabiting the country districts, and neither party desired separation from Denmark, and much less union with Germany, or that Schleswig should become a member of the Germanic Confederation. I did not fail to observe that the opinions of many persons were influenced by a particular party hostile to the present organization of the Danish monarchy, and in this I was confirmed by partisans of the union with Holstein, who admitted the influence alluded to, but confessed they had become the followers of the party only as a means of obtaining release from the vexatious system of the ultra-Danish party. They further admitted that their leaders, the nobility (ritterschaft), and large landed proprietors, are not looked upon as their true friends, as they support the privileges of certain classes, and are adverse to the introduction of liberal institutions.”

He would not deny that the Duchies had certain grievances against the Danish Government, nor had Her Majesty's Government ever maintained that Denmark had fulfilled all her promises. His hon. Friend, however, went on to say that because Denmark had not done so it was our duty not to take her part; but he could not acknowledge the justice of that argument. After Denmark offered, though late, to fulfil her promises, the casus belli was removed; and therefore for Austria and Prussia to have then gone to war with her was a great injustice. Mr. Grosvenor, a young man of intelligence, was not sent to report upon the feelings of the people of the Duchies; and if the hon. and gallant Member would look at the papers he would find that Sir Andrew Buchanan warned them against taking Mr. Grosvenor's opinion on that point. Mr. Grosvenor was sent to Holstein for a specific purpose. It had been stated that the Commissioners of the Diet, instead of doing that which they pledged themselves to do on commencing Federal execution—namely, to administer the Duchy in the name of the Duke of Holstein, had exceeded their powers, and proceeded to establish the authority of the Duke of Augustenburg. That statement was denied in Germany, and Mr. Grosvenor went to ascertain whether the arms of the King of Denmark had been pulled down, whether the authorities appointed by the King had been removed, and whether the Duke of Augustenburg had been virtually installed as ruler of the Duchy? These facts Mr. Grosvenor proved, but nothing more, and therefore, as far as the feelings of the population were concerned, he was no authority whatever. From all the information he (Mr. Layard) received it was a matter of public notoriety, that there was in Schleswig certainly no general desire on the part of the people to elect the Duke of Augustenburg as their Prince, or to separate themselves from Denmark. That was his impression, and he believed it was the impression of all who had taken the trouble to inquire into the matter. In conclusion, he would only add that the object of Her Majesty's Government was to restore peace; that he trusted that object would be attained, and felt sure the House would not create any fresh difficulties in the way of its attainment.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that before the House passed from that Question he desired to enter a protest with respect to those Danish debates. The hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) had spoken more than once on that subject, and they frequently had these Danish debates interpolated, as it were, in their discussions, when strong statements were made by the hon. Baronet and other hon. Members, advocates of the same cause. Now the enormous majority of that House sympathized with Denmark in that matter. But the Members of that majority had shown themselves anxious not to mar any chances that might exist of the restoration of that peace which they all desired by obtruding themselves with unnecessary vehemence in the debates that had taken place. He feared, however, that that reticence and forbearance on their part had been misunderstood out of doors. The hon. Baronet and the other partisans of Germany in that House, who might be counted upon one's fingers, had, he believed, with great ingenuity and skill, by showing themselves repeatedly, and on every possible occasion and in every possible guise, contrived to give the public out of doors the impression—the false and delusive impression—that there was a German party in the House of Commons. It was not his intention to enter into the arguments of the hon. Baronet or into what the hon. Baronet called his facts—it was not his intention, either, to enter into those feelings which led hon. Gentlemen to sympathize with faithless and treacherous despoilers, which feelings happily were rare among Englishmen. But he would only say this, that he trusted that no one out of doors would entertain the impression that because they did not contradict the statements—the wild and chimerical statements made with regard both to historical and present facts, the House, therefore, admitted them. Discussions upon that subject could not be fairly taken until the negotiations had been concluded, and until that House was placed by the failure—if failure it should unfortunately prove—of the Executive to bring that matter to a satisfactory termination, in a position to express its opinion on these unhappy transactions without thereby exposing to additional dangers those with whose miseries and unjust sufferings it most heartily sympathized.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rejoiced exceedingly that the noble Lord had elicited the true feeling of the House. As he had been personally alluded to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney), he trusted the hon. Baronet was now satisfied that when he spoke his opinion plainly he had some grounds for it. The hon. Baronet the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had referred to foreign agitators who had disturbed the internal peace of Holstein and Schleswig. Not so very long ago Canada was invaded by sympathizers from the United States, just as the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein had been; but the conduct of the Government of the United States on that occasion ought to be remembered for ever with gratitude by this country. They lent no countenance to that system of sympathizing or filibustering. On the contrary, in spite of the feeling of a portion of their own people, they acted loyally towards us and enabled us in every way to repress that unjustifiable aggression upon Canada. The reprehensible conduct of Germany towards Denmark in the present instance was in striking contrast to the honourable conduct of the United States in that instance. He rejoiced to see at this moment a feeling which was truly natural exhibited towards Denmark, for it was no question of Schleswig or Holstein now. The whole of Jutland was now occupied, and the invaders were levying contributions on its inhabitants, and taking hostages in default of their payment. The question had come to this, that were it not for the sea, on which England had once some power, the State of Denmark would, he firmly believed, be swept from the category of nations—a fate from which he trusted England would see that gallant people saved.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to explain that he had not expressed any approval of the conduct of Austria and Prussia, who had betrayed the Schleswig-Holsteiners in 1851-2, but had spoken of the German inhabitants of the Duchies.

INDIA—COVENANTED SERVANTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he rose to bring under the consideration of the House the position of the Civil Servants of the Crown in India who shall have entered into covenants to serve in that country. Under the nomination system there were two classes of examinations—one of a literary character, and another as to special qualifications; and those who passed those examinations had an absolute right to appointments in India. Under the former system a successful candidate entered into what was called a deed of covenant with the Secretary of State for India as to the nature of his services. The special matters to be done and left undone were set forth in that deed; but added to the deed was a penalty attached to dereliction of duty. He complained that young men thus becoming entitled to nomination, did not receive pay until they joined the presidency, to appointments to which they were nominated. He thought they should receive special pay from the time they signed the deed, and that an allowance should be made to carry them out to their destination. Such a rule was in force in the army, and ought not to be ignored in the Civil Service.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the practice complained of was only that which formerly existed with regard to writers who were nominated for India under the East India Company, the rule being that Indian service should be paid for in India, and not elsewhere. In 1858 those appointments were thrown open to competition, and the successful candidates were placed on the same footing as the servants nominated under the old system, with the difference that a sum of £100 was allowed to them to defray their expenses between the first and second examination, and towards the payment of the expenses of their journey, and as, even on the hon. Baronet's own showing, so far from there being any want of candidates, there were at least two for every vacancy, he could not see any ground for altering the existing regulations.

MR. VANSITTART said, he could confirm the statement of the right hon. Baronet as to the expenses of the old system. His anxious parents sent him to Haileybury College, where he spent the required time and passed the necessary examination, and yet he never received a single rupee from the Indian Government until he arrived in India. He could not, therefore, see what claim those poverty-stricken members of the Universities of Dublin, who were not compelled to enter the service, and who were not half so good as the Haileybury men, had on the Government for payment before their arrival in India.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (SALE ON SUNDAYS).—LEAVE.

MR. SOMES moved for leave to bring in a Bill to impose restrictions on the sale of intoxicating liquors between eleven o'clock on Saturday night and six o'clock on Monday morning. The hon. Gentleman said that some explanation might be necessary with regard to this Bill, as it was different from that of last year. Last year his Bill proposed the total closing of public-houses on the Lord's Day. He gathered from the debate which occurred on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, that the House thought some time was necessary to enable the public to get their dinner and supper beer on Sundays, and the absence of any such provision seemed to constitute the main objection to the Bill. But by the present measure he proposed to give an hour for getting the dinner beer, and he also proposed to allow an hour between eight and nine, for getting the supper beer. The House would, no doubt, consider that, provision having previously been made for travellers and lodgers, and two hours being allowed for everybody else, it could not be for the benefit of the working man and his family that he should have six hours extra for drinking in public-houses. Let them remember that the working classes prayed for this Bill. The number of persons in favour of the total closing of public-houses on the Lord's Day was 903,987, or about one in twenty of the whole population of England and Wales. The great bulk of those who signed the petitions he was referring to were of the working classes, who, most of any, were directly interested in the passing of the Bill. A working man said to a London clergyman, "People say we working men show that we are weak when we ask the Legislature to close public-houses on Sundays, because then we have our wages in our pockets, and nothing to do;" but do not the aristocrats pray every day, "Lead us not into temptation," and should not the working men also be preserved from temptation when they beg it as a favour at our hands? The convictions from Saturday and Sunday nights exceeded those of every other day in the week. Sunday was the high day of England's drunkenness, caused by spending the wages that should go to the wife and family. If they wished the working-men to get their dinner beer and supper beer, the Bill gave them two hours for that purpose. Such a measure as this had been said to be an interference with the liberty of the subject. Look, however, at the case of Scotland. Would any one say that Scotland was behindhand in the love of liberty? And yet that country had found that a severer measure than that which I propose was not incompatible with such a sentiment. She preferred to preserve the liberty of thousands by closing public-houses on Sunday—those thousands who, in the absence of such restriction, would find themselves on Monday morning in the hands of the police. In New York for years the public-houses had been closed on Sundays, and such had likewise been the case in Sydney and in other of our colonies. These facts went to show that this measure is not the offspring of a society, or of a people unmindful of the blessings of liberty. Seeing the impatience of the House, he would not trespass further upon their attention, but would simply move for leave to introduce a Bill for restrictions on the sale of intoxicating liquors between the hours of eleven of the clock on Saturday night and six of the clock on Monday morning. He would not trouble the House with further details and statistics on the question, which would be unusual at this stage of the Bill; but he trusted that after the petitions, signed by thousands, which had been presented in favour of the larger measure, the House would not deny to them the present modicum.

MR. PEASE begged to second the Motion. The subject of the proposed Bill only required to be better understood to be better appreciated. It had been proved to demonstration that the chief difficulty all our religious and philanthropic institutions had to contend with arose from the drinking customs of this country. Such was the deliberate opinion of the judge upon the bench, the clergyman in the pulpit, the Sabbath School teacher, and others acquainted with the habits of the lower classes. The proposed Bill had on the face of it something so reasonable that he was satisfied the House would allow it to be introduced, and he was persuaded that on further examination it would be found that the objections relative to an alleged interference with the private rights were not so cogent as some hon. Gentlemen supposed. He had the honour of representing a large constituency, and all classes had joined in requesting him to support the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill for restrictions on the sale of Intoxicating Liquors between the hours of eleven of the clock on Saturday night and six of the clock on Monday morning."—(Mr. Somes.)

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would not detain the House for many minutes, for there were two considerations which compelled him to be brief—one the lateness of the hour, and the other the fact that the introduction of a Bill was supposed to be a mere matter of courtesy. He had no fanatical hatred to the proposed measure; his only desire was to protect his countrymen in the fair enjoyment of their rights and liberties. As for the question of courtesy, he begged the House to recollect that though the present was said to be a different Bill from that which was decided last year, it was, in reality, the same. [Cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen might cry "No, no," but before he had done he would prove "Yes, yes." The ground of that Bill was twofold. There was a body of people in this country who were Sabbatarians; there was also a body of Teetotallers. Those two muddy streams of sentiment had united. Running side by side for a long time, they had at last united their waters, and now they formed one foaming, muddy river, which it was difficult to stem, and very disagreeable to see. [An hon. MEMBER: And to smell.] Aye, and to smell. Those two sets of people had joined their forces on the present occasion. Why did he oppose them? First and foremost, because that was a law for the poor and not for the rich. A rich, well-to-do man could have his own beer or wine in his own house, he could draw his beer or uncork his wine when he chose, but that was not the case with a poor man. Parliament began with fiscal regulations. It had put a tax upon malt, and he had always voted with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that subject, but he had always felt that he was preventing the poor man having his own beer in his own house and driving him to the public-house. He wished the House to understand that every man who went into a public-house was not a tippler. The poor man who was compelled to go to the public-house was like the gentleman who sent down his butler for his glass of wine when he wanted it. If the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Somes) and his friends were really in earnest—if they were anything more than canting hypocrites—they would propose a law for the rich as well as the poor. Not only would they shut up every public-house—not only would they shut up the Star and Garter at Richmond, and the Trafalgar at Greenwich, but they would also shut up every club in London. Would they dare to introduce a Bill for that purpose? If not, how could they presume to say that they were the friends of morality and justice? He spat upon their paltry pretence. He had no hesitation in saying that those who were endeavouring to bring in that Bill under the guise of being the protectors of morality, were merely carrying out their own individual views respecting the enjoyments of others. "We are virtuous," they exclaimed, "and, therefore, you shall have no more cakes and ale." The introduction of that Bill would create dissension throughout England. [Cries of "No, no!"] "Yes, yes;" it would create the necessity on the part of hon. Members who thought, as he did, of sifting the sentiments of the people of England, as they did last year. The seconder of the Motion had talked of representing a large constituency. He represented a still larger constituency, and he opposed this Bill. Last Session he presented a petition signed by 20,000 people, and when he went down among his constituents during the year what occurred? Several gentlemen came to him and said, "Oh, this is a people's measure, and you must support it." His reply was, "Prove that to me and I will vote for the Bill." They had a meeting in the open air, and it was carried against them by a majority of thousands. So much for the present being a popular measure. He represented a set of hardworking men who were confined to a smoky town all the week, and, as he said to those gentlemen, if he lived in Sheffield he should be very glad to get out on a Sunday to breathe a mouthful of fresh air. A working man who had expended his week in hard labour was naturally glad to get out of Sheffield for a few hours on Sunday, but if the hon. Gentleman's Bill passed he would find the door of every public-house shut against him. That man was not necessarily a tippler. What right had they to say to that man that he should only have his luncheon at one o'clock, and not at three, if he liked it best then? Public-houses in the country were only open now from twelve to three, and from five to eleven. What harm was there in that? A working man in London went out on Sunday for a few hours' recreation, and then those sour Gentlemen turned round on him and said, "You ought to be at church." That was their creed—that if they kept a man out of the public-house they sent him to church. If a man were religiously inclined he went to church before he took his walk into the country; and was it not a way of worshipping the great Creator to walk among His works and admire their beauty? The Bill would not put an end to drinking; it would force men to break the law. There would be just as much drunkenness as ever, and a great increase of hypocrisy. The hon. Gentleman had quoted the example of Scotland. Scotland was an ascetic country, with a peculiar flavour for what was called Sabbath observance, and it was the most drunken country on the face of the earth. A friend of his who had been in Scotland on a visit had brought back a very good story. He was stopping in the neighbourhood of a very beautiful waterfall, and when Sunday came round, there being an interval between kirk and dinner, he said, "I'll go and see your waterfall." "Gude mon," said his host, "it's the Sabbath." "What, then," replied his friend, "can't I see God's works on God's day?" "Oh, no," replied the host; "You maun stay here; you can't break the Sabbath." And in deference to his host the gentleman staid indoors and they sat down to spend the day in tippling. That was a well-to-do house, where they could drink their own beer and whisky without having to send out of the house for it. Did the hon. Gentleman believe that he would make men worship God more completely by compelling them to abstain from walking abroad? What he wanted was to turn this nation into a sour, ascetic, hypocritical people. The Bill was the same in substance as that which was introduced last year, and the hon. Gentleman was honest enough to say that the modifications which he had introduced were against his will. That was exactly the principle of the promoters of the Bill—they thought a thing was wrong, but still they did it. The Bill last year was rejected with ignominy, and to prevent the dissension and dissatisfaction which were occasioned then he would ask the House to mark its sense of it by refusing leave to introduce it.

MR. CLAY said, he thought that the House ought to allow the Bill to be brought in, if it were only out of respect for the immense number of petitions which had been presented in its favour, more especially as various important modifications had been introduced into it in deference to the opinions expressed in the House last year.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, that although he had the greatest respect for the hon. Members the Mover and Seconder of that Motion, and lamented equally with them the inclination to drink existing in this country, yet he hoped that the House would not sanction the commencement of an agitation such as had taken place before, in consequence of the course they were about to adopt. Eight years ago there was a sort of émeute among the three millions of the population in this metropolis, which led Parliament to change a recently-passed law with more haste than was altogether seemly. A compromise was then agreed to, which had satisfied the public and licensed victuallers. He hoped the Government and the House generally would pause before embarking on a project like the present, which was calculated to bring about a repetition of those scenes. What was proposed was that the poor man should only be allowed two hours out of the twenty-four on Sundays to get his beer. A working man might not be able to get out till late in the afternoon, and it was not right that he should be deprived of the opportunity of enjoying his only holiday in the week. This proposal did not take into account the state of three millions; and those hon. Members who supported the measure had not visited the working man's home. He believed the measure was one likely to cause great dissatisfaction both in the metropolis and throughout the country, and would, if carried, cause the same agitation as it did on a former occasion, and hon. Members would very likely end (as they nearly did before), by seeing all the restrictions as to opening public-houses on Sunday swept away.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that last year, in deference to the strong opinions expressed by a large number of persons in the country, and from a desire that the subject might be fully and fairly discussed, he gave his vote for the introduction of the Bill. He had no reason to regret that he did so, for the advocates of the measure had an ample opportunity of stating the grounds on which it could be defended, and the House rejected it, on the second reading, by a numerous majority. Therefore he did not think he could now be accused of any want of respect to the supporters of the Bill if he declined to follow the same course again. The proposal before them was substantially the same as that of last year. As had been remarked, if the Bill were allowed to be brought in and the second reading were fixed for a fortnight hence, the interval would be spent in canvassing and agitation, and in the end, he was confident, the House would reject the measure. It was only a few years since the existing restrictions were adopted, and he could not but think it was inexpedient to attempt to disturb the arrangement then come to. He should, therefore, vote against the Motion.

MR. HORSFALL said, he must express his surprise that the House, as an assembly of Gentlemen, should have tolerated the language of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). The hon. and learned Member had no right to stigmatize nearly a million of his fellow countrymen as "canting hypocrites," or to apply that epithet to any Gentleman in the House. He was astonished, also, to hear him say he spat on the Bill. He thought that such language was not becoming the dignity of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman had told them that he stood up for the rights and privileges of the people; but he seemed to ignore the claims of the poor barmen, who had petitioned Parliament in thousands to afford them relief. He appealed to the House to comply with their request. The hon. and learned Member undertook to prove that the Bill was precisely the same as that of last year, but had neglected to do so. The fact was, the Bill was different from its predecessor. His hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Somes) consulted him on the subject, and he recommended him not to submit the same Bill to the House, but to defer to the opinions then generally expressed, and allow two hours a day. His hon. Friend had taken that advice. He regretted that the Home Secretary had not seen fit to grant the courtesy of a first reading, but hoped the House would not yield to the influence of the Government in the matter.

Mr. PACKE said, that the Bill founded the innocent with the guilty, and deprived the sober man of his beer because others got drunk. That was a kind of legislation the House ought never to agree to. The case of Scotland was entirely different to that of England. There malt liquor was not the beverage of the people who drank whisky, which could be kept at home, whereas beer could not. He should vote against the introduction of the Bill.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, who had given Notice "To call Attention to the present State of the Danish Question," said: My Lords, when I gave notice of my intention to bring this subject under the consideration of your Lordships I did so under the belief that the Conference, which was then sitting, was practically at an end. I have heard since then that it has been stated in another place that that Conference is still sitting—that an armistice has been agreed to and accepted by all parties. I will at once state that it is my intention, if that Report be true, to withdraw my notice; but I shall be glad to hear from the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary whether that is so—and perhaps he will also be good enough to inform your Lordships under what circumstances the armistice has been agreed to, and what the terms and conditions of the armistice are?

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I have to state to your Lordships with great satisfaction that at the Conference to-day a suspension of hostilities has been agreed to, between Austria and Prussia on one side and Denmark on the other. The terms on which the suspension of hostilities has been agreed to are on the basis of the uti possidetis—each Power retaining its own position both by sea and land. The blockade is to be raised, and the suspension of arms is to be for one month. The Conference will meet again on Thursday.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: Do I understand that Jutland is not to be evacuated?

EARL RUSSELL: The question was between a suspension of arms and an armistice. The Allied Powers agreed to a proposition made in Conference by which Jutland would have been evacuated by the Germans, and Alsen by the Danes; but the Danish Government have preferred a simple suspension of hostilities for one month.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Under the circumstances I shall postpone my Notice. I cannot say, however, that the statement which has fallen from the noble Earl is satisfactory to me. I am not sanguine enough to expect any great results from the Conference now sitting. I should not, I hope, in the observations which it was my intention to make, have said anything whatever to embarrass Her Majesty's Government; but, under the circumstances, inasmuch as a result has been obtained—though a very moderate one—I doubt, indeed, whether any subsequent result will be obtained of any moment—I will not say anything that, however indirectly, may tend to embarrass Her Majesty's Government. At the same time I cannot say that I have heard with any great satisfaction the terms on which this armistice has been agreed to. It seems to me an armistice the most one-sided I ever heard of—an armistice all the advantage of which is for the Germans. But I am sure of this, that Denmark, by her moderation in accepting these terms, has entitled herself as much to the sympathy of Europe as she has done by the extraordinary gallantry she has shown.

EARL RUSSELL: As I have already said, it was proposed in Conference that there should be an armistice on the terms that Jutland and Alesn should be evacuated, and that there should be an entire suspension of the blockade. Denmark, of her own accord, preferred a simple suspension of hostilities. I cannot say I think her wrong in that preference. The noble Earl says he has very moderate expectations as to the result of the Conference. I cannot quarrel with him on that account; but I am not surprised that the Conference, which met on the 25th of April, has not in fourteen days come to a conclusion upon questions which have created so much difference of opinion for the last fourteen years.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: The noble Earl will perhaps be good enough to tell us on what day the suspension of arms is to commence with regard to Jutland?

POLAND.—RESOLUTIONS.

LORD CAMPBELL: My Lords, in rising to call attention to the Correspondence upon Poland, I wish it to be understood that I was quite ready to give precedence to the notice upon Denmark had it been the pleasure of the House, as I was told on Friday that it would be. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) having just withdrawn his notice, I have no course left except that of troubling your Lordships. My Lords, I am well aware of the nearly fatal disadvantage under which I do so. When Parliament has been and is engrossed by a transaction geographically nearer, still more critical, and still more vitally affecting our interest and honour, every other subject comes to be regarded with aversion. But it does not in the least follow that no duty remains to be fulfilled by us in reference to Poland. And should there be one, the events in Denmark, agitating as they are, can hardly supersede it. They increase, no doubt, the difficulty of suggesting it, and require brevity from any one who does so, but will not, I trust, preclude, on the part of this House at least, a limited indulgence. But, if it is essential in some degree to vindicate allusion to the Polish question at this moment, a fact well known to the House may be sufficient for the purpose. My noble Friend the Foreign Secretary delivered in the autumn a speech of much political significance. In that speech he uttered the opinions which form the basis of the present Resolutions. Addressing not only the people of Blairgowrie, but the country and the world, he informed them that the Czar had violated the conditions upon which the Treaty of Vienna had made him Sovereign in Poland; and that in consequence his title there could hardly be maintained. The speech caused a general vibration on the Continent, where, at that time, the Polish question overruled all others. I happened to be in Paris, coming back from Warsaw, at the moment, and I can speak in some degree of the impression which the noble Lord produced whose foreign policy was canvassed. For many days the press abounded with remarks upon his statement. It gave the Poles the liveliest assurance not of material support, but of such a diplomatic line as it appeared to promise and foreshadow. The question in Paris was—will a despatch be issued to St. Petersburg in the same sense and the same spirit. The despatch which followed in October was very far indeed from corresponding with the language at Blairgowrie. It rather dwelt on the benevolent intentions of the Czar, than on the wrongs of Poland and the violations of the treaty. Soon afterwards a strong impression gained currency in Europe that a despatch had reached St. Petersburg, of the very kind which might have been anticipated; that before it was presented the Russian Government objected to it; that, in obedience to their wishes, it was modified or mutilated, or in some degree transformed. In the other House of Parliament this Session, questions have been put, and the answers which the First Minister has given do not clash at all with such a version of what happened. If this notice elicits from the noble Lord an avowal that he was true to the opinions he delivered at Blairgowrie, until new events controlled the Foreign Office; if it elicits from him an avowal that he still maintains the view which in September he pronounced, the Polish cause will gain, according to the judgment of its highest representatives. Whether or not the Resolutions are accepted by the House, I may thus hope to be humbly instrumental in effecting an advantage for a people with whose objects it is easy to connect the balance of power, and in some contingencies the safety of Great Britain, although it is not requisite to touch upon the reasoning which leads to a conclusion of that nature. My Lords, if it is now clear that the subject ought not to be excluded, I can explain in a word the political result the Resolutions aim at. It is not to shake the power of the Czar, a result which some Members of the House desire and others deprecate. It is not even to give encouragement to Poland, a result which some noble Lords regard as inconsistent with our policy. The object they propose may challenge approbation from all parties, since it is merely to repair, so far as it is possible, the dignity and honour of the country which are compromised and tarnished by the attitude in which we stand upon the Polish question. At the same time, they do not call upon the Government to renew or to extend the correspondence with St. Petersburg. They allege that it has not reached a satisfactory conclusion, and that the Government are not bound to recognize the sovereignty in Poland, which the Treaty of Vienna called into existence, while that treaty is neglected; in other words, that at their own time, Ministers would be justified in taking the very course my noble Friend is understood to have adopted, or, at least, to have begun and afterwards recoiled from. Were such Resolutions voted, although Government did nothing for the present, our diplomacy would have a very different end from that which now belongs to it. Reluctant as I am to detain the House, it is essential to advert to the Correspondence in order to ascertain how far it requires such a step as I propose. It is not at all requisite to dwell upon the early stages which came last Session before Parliament. A few words ought to revive a picture once familiar to your Lordships. Two despatches to

Lord Campbell

Lord Napier, dated March 2 and April 10, 1863, contained the views of Her Majesty's Government on the Polish question. Their effect was to array nearly all the Powers who had signed the Treaty of Vienna in a remonstrance to the Czar, as to the misgovernment which had brought about the Polish insurrection. The reply of Prince Gortschakoff, dated April 26, and interpreted by Baron Brunnow, in an interview with the noble Lord on May 2, was accepted as in some degree encouraging. It led at least to a new effort in which France and Austria participated. On the 17th of June an elaborate despatch was addressed by the noble Lord to Lord Napier at St. Petersburg, in which Russia was advised to make six concessions to the Poles, in which an armistice was recommended between the Czar and the Insurgents, and, last of all, a Conference of all the Powers which had signed the Treaty of Vienna. The reply of Prince Gortschakoff was dated July 1. It forms an epoch in the Correspondence. It excited much uneasiness in Parliament. It rejected all the propositions of the Foreign Office; it dropped the mask which had been worn, and would hear of no arrangement for the Poles until the insurrection was annihilated. We now pass beyond the boundary of last Session, and come to the despatches which have never yet been brought before your Lordships. The noble Lord answered Prince Gortschakoff on the 11th of August, and after copious refutation of his arguments, informed him that if Russia persisted in defiance of the treaty she would incur a very grave responsibility. On the 1st of September, in a manner which can only be described as a contemptuous one, Prince Gortschakoff declared the readiness of his Government to accept the whole responsibility of the course they were pursuing. The speech of my noble Friend on September 28th at Blairgowrie forms the next stage in the proceedings. Then follows the despatch of October 20, which seemed to contradict its tenor and to neutralize its value. As the question now before the House turns upon that document, the last which left the Foreign Office for St. Petersburg, its very phrases ought to be before your Lordships. After acknowledging the despatch of Prince Gortschakoff of September 9, it runs as follows:—

“Her Majesty's Government have no wish to prolong the correspondence on the subject of Poland for the mere purpose of controversy.

Her Majesty's Government receive with satisfaction the assurance that the Emperor of Russia continues to be animated with intentions of benevolence towards Poland, and of conciliation in respect to all foreign Powers.

Her Majesty's Government acknowledge that the relations of Russia towards European Powers are regulated by public law; but the Emperor of Russia has special obligations in regard to Poland.

Her Majesty's Government have in the despatch of the 11th of August, and preceding despatches, shown, that in regard to this particular question, the rights of Poland are contained in the same instrument which constitutes the Emperor of Russia King of Poland."

The House would look in vain through the despatch for a protest against the title which, according to the noble Lord, the Czar had forfeited in Poland. Its tone is one of acquiescence rather than reproach. But by far the most powerful and striking comment on its tendency is found in the remarks which it led to from Prince Gortschakoff, and which Lord Napier has reported. On the 27th of October, Lord Napier wrote to Earl Russell from St. Petersburg as follows:—

"The Vice Chancellor read your Lordship's despatch through aloud without offering any remark. In conclusion his Excellency observed, that in the communication with which I was charged, he saw a proof of the friendly disposition of Her Majesty's Government, and an act conformable to the true interest of Poland; for the moderation of Her Majesty's Government must discourage the exaggerated expectations of the revolutionary party, and hasten the moment when the Emperor would be enabled to carry into effect his benevolent intentions towards his Polish subjects."

Great Britain, in the eyes of Prince Gortschakoff, was no longer the reprover, but had sunk into the accomplice of St. Petersburg. Great Britain, in the eyes of the Vice Chancellor, by the despatch of October 27, had become an instrument in hastening the moment when the insurrection would succumb, and Polish nationality be stifled. This was the conclusion of the labours for the Polish cause by which Europe had been roused, and which France and Austria had conspicuously supported. Would any man presume to rise in either House of Parliament and call it satisfactory or tolerable? Would anybody venture to deny that the country was dishonoured until by some method she flung back the revolting praise which Russia had inflicted on us? And can it be done with greater moderation than by stating that Parliament is not responsible for the humiliating close of our diplomacy, and that in their opinion the Government are not bound to recognize a sovereignty which the Treaty of Vienna had created while its stipulations are forgotten, and while its objects are defied. In the full conviction that my noble Friend has held the very language which the Resolutions would suggest—that the despatch of October 27 was not the one originally contemplated—that the speech at Blairgowrie represented the genuine convictions and half accomplished measures of the Foreign Office, I shall not undertake myself, but leave to him the vindication of his doctrine. To such abilities as his the task would be an easy one. It would not be an effort to point out, by referring to the 1st article of the treaty, that Russia is bound to uphold the Polish nationality wherever it existed, and not only in what is now known as the kingdom. It would be still less difficult to show that the Russian system is directed to exterminate the very race which the Treaty of 1815 aspired to perpetuate. It follows that the sovereignty of the Czar, in every part of ancient Poland, is illegal. But in reply to those who think that such a declaration, although unanswerable, would be useless, my noble Friend might urge that the leading representatives of Poland have assiduously demanded it with a view to the position it would give them in their struggle. He might show that such a manifesto must pave the way for every legitimate solution of a question by which Europe has been agitated. Above all, he might dilate on the magnitude and stages of the crime involved in the dismemberment of Poland, and to which Great Britain is a party when she acknowledges the title of the Czar reposing as it does upon that crime, and not upon the treaty as its basis. My Lords, I stated that the practical result to which the Resolutions looked was one which all parties in the House would admit to be desirable, namely, to recall the dignity and honour of the country which the startling end of our diplomacy on this question has eclipsed. But there is one collateral advantage which they seem to me to promise. It cannot be denied that the alliance with France has suffered by our Polish Correspondence. On that side of the Channel it was felt that we had yielded too much to Russian influence and menace, and too suddenly renounced the path which in the spring of 1863 the French Government had joined us in attempting. When, indeed, the Cabinet of St. Petersburg could venture in October to describe us an ally against the Polish insurrection, the opinion could not be considered an unfounded one. A temperate and guarded declaration of what we feel as to the Polish title of the Czar, would do something to remove impressions of that character. Such an effect will not be underrated by your Lordships at a moment when the union of the Western Powers is seen to be more than ever indispensable to the integrity of free States, the peace of Europe, and the safety of the world. On this ground, as much as any, I commend the Resolutions to the favourable judgment of your Lordships, and move—

"That, in the Opinion of this House, the Correspondence of Her Majesty's Government with the Cabinet of Saint Petersburg on the Polish Question has not as yet reached a satisfactory Conclusion :

"That, in the Opinion of this House, the Czar having failed to comply with the Conditions upon which, according to the Treaty of Vienna, he acquired his Sovereignty in Poland, it is no longer binding on Her Majesty's Government to acknowledge it."

EARL RUSSELL said, he thought their Lordships would agree with him in thinking that there could be no practical utility in coming to a Resolution in conformity with his noble Friend's Motion. On the contrary, he thought it would tend rather to impair than to increase the authority of the House. Out of respect to his noble Friend, he would, however, go over very briefly the different steps of the diplomatic negotiations in regard to Poland. Their Lordships knew that in 1831 a struggle took place in the Kingdom of Poland, similar to that of last year. His noble Friend Lord Palmerston, who was then Secretary of State under the Premiership of Earl Grey, carried on a correspondence in which he strongly protested against the acts of the Russian Government in Poland. The reply of the Russian Government was that the insurrection had put an end to the obligations of the Treaty of Vienna, and that the Kingdom of Poland was in the position of a conquered territory. In the beginning of last year, Lord Palmerston being then himself Premier, I reproduced the same arguments that my noble Friend had used, and the Russian Government replied very much to the effect—that they were not disposed to agree in principle to the proposals made by the Governments of England, France, and Austria. They acknowledged fully the authority of the Treaty of Vienna, and the obligations under which the Russian Government lay; but they urged that during a period of insurrection it was impossible, without destroying the legitimate authority of the Russian Government, to carry out the conditions laid down in that treaty, and that therefore their consideration must be postponed until a time of tranquillity; they alleged, moreover, that those conditions would not at all fulfil the expectations of the Polish insurgents, because what the Poles asked for was the restoration of the ancient Poland—not merely of the Kingdom of Poland, but of all the provinces which formerly belonged to that kingdom. Without finding fault with the Polish insurgents (for it was, of course, for them to consider what was their best part to take), still he must say that they had placed themselves on a ground where it was impossible for the parties to the Treaty of Vienna to follow them. At the end of July, there was a good deal of discussion between the three Governments of England, France, and Austria as to what should be the terms of a despatch to be sent in reply to the Russian Government. As appeared from the papers laid on the table of the French Legislative Body, the French Government wished that an identical despatch should be adopted; but Her Majesty's Government thought that that would imply action on the part of this country; while the Austrian Government, as is well known, were most averse to war on behalf of Poland: and every despatch and telegraphic communication from Vienna expressed over and over again the desire that Her Majesty's Government would do nothing to force the Austrian Government into war, as the state of their finances and other circumstances forbade them to look to war with any other feeling but the greatest apprehension. Her Majesty's Government, for reasons already explained in a former debate, were not likely to go to war on behalf of Poland, and for this obvious reason—that that country, unlike Greece and Belgium, in which insurrections had taken place, and where Governments had been set up which could be acknowledged, had effected nothing in the shape of successful insurrection, nor set up any Government which could be acknowledged and supported by the Governments of England, France, and Austria. In these circumstances the Austrian Government proposed to write a despatch to the Russian Government, containing the following expressions:—

"In again communicating our views to Prince Gortschakoff there would remain to us, at all events, an imperative duty to fulfil. It is that of calling his most serious attention to the gravity of the situation, and the responsibility which it imposes on Russia. Austria, France, and Great Britain have pointed out the urgency of putting an end to a state of things in itself deplorable, and full of perils for Europe. They have, at the same time, described the means which it appears to them should be employed to reach this end, and they have offered their concurrence with a view of attaining it with greater certainty. If Russia does not effect all that depends upon her to second the moderate and conciliatory views of these three Powers, if she does not enter upon the path which is pointed out to her by friendly counsels, she exposes herself to the grave consequences which the prolongation of the troubles of Poland may produce."

This despatch was accepted by this country and by France. It did not pledge this country to war, but left England, France, and Austria at liberty to say at any time that they had warned Russia of the consequences of neglecting their friendly counsels. The French Government, contrary to the opinion of Austria and England, were for taking a course which, according to the judgment of Her Majesty's Government, would have ended in war, and there were reasons why Her Majesty's Government should not commit themselves to war. Under these circumstances, it was an easy matter for Prince Gortschakoff to say that he was willing to accept the responsibility imposed on him; but, at the same time, Prince Gortschakoff did not say, as he (Earl Russell) had supposed that Prince to have said, that Russia was in any degree freed from the obligations of the Treaty of Vienna. It was under the supposition that Prince Gortschakoff had made that statement that he delivered the speech alluded to by his noble Friend; and, in reply to the inquiry of his noble Friend as to what communication was made to the Russian Government, he had to observe that, in a despatch of the 20th of October, it was stated that—

"Her Majesty's Government have, in the despatch of the 11th of August and preceding despatches, shown that in regard to this particular question the rights of Poland are contained in the same instrument which constitutes the Emperor of Russia King of Poland."

After that despatch he received an assurance that the Russian Government fully acknowledged their obligations under the Treaty of Vienna. Then the question arose whether, without the hope of obtaining some practical benefit, it would have been wise to lose all the advantages which might hereafter arise from that acknowledgment by pressing certain demands on the Russian Government. If the Polish

Insurgents had asserted their independence, and established an insurrectionary Government, it might have been possible to press those demands on the Russian Government; but as this was not the case, and as Austria and England were not willing to go to war, Russia was then reminded of her obligations arising out of the Treaty of Vienna. With respect to his opinion on the subject, he could only say that it had not at all altered. He did not think that the Emperor of Russia, if he persisted in a time of tranquillity to disregard all the obligations of the Treaty of Vienna, could make any just appeal to that treaty as the title of his sovereignty in Poland. The case, however, did not now arise, and he thought it would be imprudent on the part of Her Majesty's Government to raise it at the present time. He thought that they had better rest on the diplomatic Correspondence, very unsatisfactory as it appeared to him, which had taken place, rather than urge pressing demands which the Emperor of Russia might think freed him from his obligations. Looking to the future, he could not think that an Emperor of Russia of intelligent views could continue to govern Poland as if it was a country in perpetual insurrection. When some years ago some Polish friends spoke to him (Earl Russell) on the subject of Poland, he ventured to say to them—

"You have now among the Russians many who are anxious to obtain political freedom and a constitutional form of Government; and it seems to me that instead of promoting further animosity between Russia and Poland, it would be for the interest of Poland to wait until the Russian party who are in favour of freedom should obtain the privileges which they seek, and then, instead of having the Russian nation against you and opposed as they have always been with violent hostility to the Polish cause, you will have a large body among them in your favour, and you will have a greater prospect of gaining those rights which justly belong to you."

The gentlemen to whom he had spoken were, he believed, anxious to take that advice, but the violence of the Viceroy of Poland had driven the Poles in anger and despair into insurrection. As a question of general policy, he believed the Poles were far more likely to obtain their rights when there was a greater appreciation of the value of liberty in Russia than there was at present. Unfortunately, in every contest between the Government of Russia and the Polish people, there had been a strong national feeling among the Russians that the greatness and glory of their country were concerned in putting down anything like resistance on the part of Poland. When that feeling was entirely done away with, the Poles might look for a better future. He thought there had been great forgetfulness on the part of the Poles of the changes which had taken place not only in the Duchy of Poland, but, to a still greater degree, at Dantzic and in Galicia, making it hopeless to think that those provinces would ever form part of Poland again. If, however, their views were confined to Poland only, they might look forward to a better state of things; and, after a time, to a Government conducted on principles of liberty by the Poles themselves. He trusted the noble Lord would not persevere with his Resolutions.

EARL GREY concurred with the noble Earl in thinking that the Resolutions ought not to be pressed. He also agreed with his noble Friend that the Correspondence had come to an unsatisfactory conclusion—so unsatisfactory that it was better not to carry it any further. The only remark he wished to add was this—that he greatly lamented that last year, before the Correspondence began, his noble Friend had not considered to what it was likely to lead. He ventured last year to express an opinion that it could lead to no useful issue, that it was impossible for us to take up arms in behalf of Poland, and that if we did, evil only could result from our interference. All that had since occurred had shown the justice of that opinion. Our interference had only tended to encourage the Poles in a useless resistance to overwhelming force, to bring upon ourselves a rebuff which a nation like England ought not to be exposed to, and to leave matters in a worse state than we found them.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that as no other noble Lord had risen to address the House, he must ask leave to trespass on them for a moment. No argument of any sort had been adduced against the Resolutions. But, without assurance of support, he should not deem it right to run the hazard of dividing. The noble Lord the Secretary of State had made a remark which in justice to himself he (Lord Campbell) was bound to notice. He had implied that a protest against the title of the Czar would release him from the obligations which the Treaty of Vienna had imposed upon him. How was it possible to release him from the obligations of that treaty by vindicating and asserting it? If the most limited assertion of the treaty did nothing to release him, why should he be released by the most solemn and the most conspicuous assertion of it? The declaration would be in substance that the Czar could not profit by the Treaty of Vienna while he defied the Treaty of Vienna; but must observe what it required in order to enjoy what it conceded. Such a manifesto would be obviously designed to circumscribe his action by the treaty, and not to disengage him from it. If it had the latter tendency, the noble Lord would not surely have made the speech he did make in September. There was one other observation which, in justice to the Polish leaders, he (Lord Campbell) could not leave unanswered. The noble Lord had charged them with attempting to withdraw from Austria and Russia the Polish territory which belonged to them. The Insurgents had studiously avoided the attempt, obeying policy instead of yielding to ambition. They had resolved to localize the struggle between Russia and themselves, in order that the German Powers might have no pretext for conspiring against them. He (Lord Campbell) disagreed altogether with his noble Friend in one opinion he had stated, namely, that the Resolutions, if adopted, would lower the dignity of Parliament. He felt convinced they would increase it, on the grounds he had already brought before their Lordships; and he was glad to find, that although the noble Lord was unwilling to accede to them, he had not deemed it right to question either of the propositions they embodied.

Resolutions, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE INDIAN ARMY.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When he will lay upon the table of the House the proposed plan for redressing the grievances of the Officers of the late Indian Army?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that much greater delay had occurred in this matter than he had expected. A great many minute details had to be considered; but he would take care that the interests of the Officers should not suffer. Last week His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, the Secretary of War, and himself had a meeting, at which they finally arranged what was to be done. The necessary Warrant would have to be submitted to the Queen, and that would take some time, at least a few days, and as soon as the Warrant was signed it should be laid upon the table. Not one moment should be lost more than was absolutely necessary.

MINUTES OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION ON ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. MITFORD said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If the Minutes of May 19th, 1863, and March, 11th, 1864, on Endowed Schools, are to be withdrawn?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, in reply, that as he was about to reply to the Question of his hon. Friend by a suggestion, which he should take the liberty of offering to his right hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley), perhaps the House would have the kindness to allow him to preface that suggestion by a few remarks, the more especially as the position of the Government with respect to those Minutes was very peculiar and exceptional.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he rose to suggest that, if the right hon. Gentleman was going to make any statement, there should be an understanding that there would be a right to reply, in case anything should fall from him which would necessitate a reply.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he regretted the interruption of the noble Lord, for he (Mr. Bruce) could not but think that the House itself would have been much better satisfied if it had heard the short statement he had to make. However, he should refrain from making those observations now; and, in reply to his hon. Friend (Mr. Mitford), he would simply state that the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) had moved for a Return relating to the amount of endowments held by Endowed Schools assisted by the State, which would be laid on the table of the House in the course of the week. He would suggest, therefore, to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley), that inasmuch as these Minutes would not come into operation till the 30th of June, and as the House would not be in a position to judge of the effect of the Minute of March 11th of this year, without having before them the Return that had been moved for, the discussion on his Motion should be postponed until that Return was before the House, the Government undertaking to give the right hon. Gentleman a day before the 30th of June for bringing forward his Motion.

MR. MITFORD: Are the Minutes to be withdrawn or not?

MR. H. A. BRUCE: They are certainly not to be withdrawn. As I have stated, they will not come into operation till the 30th of June, and before that time arrives the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire will have an opportunity of bringing forward his Motion.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to observe that his Motion in relation to Endowed Schools could not possibly be affected by any statistical Return, as it was on principle that it disputed the application of private endowments in reduction of public grants. But if the Government asked him to postpone his Motion to another day he was bound to acquiesce, only stipulating that he should be put in as good a position as that which he was about to surrender out of courtesy to them, and that he should have, at least, a fortnight's notice of the day fixed.

MR. H. A. BRUCE: Of course both those conditions will be complied with. The suggestion that I have made is quite as much for the convenience of the House as it is for that of the Government.

EDUCATION—SCHOOL INSPECTORS' REPORTS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask, Whether the Motion of the noble Lord the Prime Minister, for the appointment of a Committee upon the Reports of Education Inspectors will come on for discussion on Thursday, and what will be the order of the business of the evening?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that it was proposed first of all to take the Motion referred to by the right hon. Member, and a Motion would be made to postpone the Orders of the Day until it had been disposed of. The hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessey) has a Motion upon the paper for Thursday with reference to Poland. As he (Sir George Grey) understood that it was not the wish of the hon. Gentleman to bring forward his Motion until the noble Lord at the head of the Government was in his place, he should ask him to postpone it until the first evening after the holidays, when Supply was the first business to be brought forward, so that the hon. Member would then stand in the same position as he did now.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would acquiesce in this arrangement.

CHINA—HONG KONG ORDINANCES. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, To which of the Hong Kong Ordinances of January, 1855, "to enforce neutrality during the contest now existing in China," his answer to the Member for South Northumberland was intended to apply, that of the 15th January, 1855, or that of the 17th January, 1855, or to both.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL was understood to say that his answer was intended to apply to the earlier and longer of the two Ordinances.

Mr. Adderley

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE CONFERENCE—CONCLUSION OF AN ARMISTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government will state what course they intend to take with regard to the Danish Question before the House adjourns for Whitsuntide?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, the Question put to me by the hon. Gentleman is similar to that which was put to me the other day by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). I then stated that the Conference was sitting, and that we hoped that its first result would be the establishment of an Armistice, and that the Government would continue, in concert with other Powers, to take those measures which were best calculated to conduce to the restoration of peace. I have now the satisfaction to inform the House that at its sitting to-day the Conference has agreed upon an Armistice for a month.

Afterwards—

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask, Whether the right hon. Baronet has any objection to communicate to the House the terms of the Armistice?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I am quite unable to communicate the terms of the Armistice at present, but there will be no difficulty of doing so at an early date.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. HASSARD said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he has directed his attention to the Petition filed by the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland against the Attorney General and others in the matter of the "Fanning Charity, Waterford," and to the Judgment pronounced thereon by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 3rd May instant; and if it is his intention to introduce any measure to amend the Laws relating to Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland?

MR. O'HAGAN said, in reply, that his attention had been directed to the case in question, and that the Lord Chancellor had expressed some doubts as to his jurisdiction in certain matters of great importance relating to the Charities in Ireland. He had himself been in communication with the Commissioners of Charitable Donations, and he proposed to introduce a measure shortly after the recess which he hoped would set all these doubts at rest.

VACCINATION OF SHEEP.—QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, in the absence of the Return of the Results of Experiments in Vaccinating Sheep, the question of Infection at the long range of 500 yards, as stated at p. 259 of the Fifth Report of the Medical Officers of the Privy Council, will be considered by the Select Committee on the Cattle Diseases Prevention and Cattle, &c. Importation Bills?

MR. H. A. BRUCE, in reply, said, he had no doubt the subject mentioned by his hon. Friend would be fully considered by the Committee.

MAGISTERIAL CONVICTIONS IN CORNWALL.—QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to inquire, Whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has been directed to a statement in the papers describing the committal of a whole family for three weeks, with hard labour, for the offence of sleeping under a tent? The statement was to the effect that a family of gipsies—a mother with six children, the youngest being only eight years old—had been committed to gaol by the Rev. Uriah Tonkin, on the 25th or 26th of last month, at a place called Hale, in Cornwall. He also wished to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman will not make inquiry into the circumstances, with a view to advise Her Majesty to remit the sentence, and whether he has any objection to lay on the table the depositions and conviction?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that he had received no information respecting the case referred to by the hon. Member. No application had been made to him by any of the parties concerned. If the hon. Gentleman would give him the particulars, he would make inquiries, but he could not give any intimation as to what the result of those inquiries would be. It was probable that the prisoners were convicted under the Vagrancy Act.

VOL. CLXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

SCHOOL OF NAVAL ARCHITECTURE.

SIR WILLIAM SNOW HARRIS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought that on a former occasion the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had spoken in very unhandsome terms of Sir William Snow Harris, stating that though he might be an authority upon lightning conductors, he was no authority upon a School of Naval Architecture, and that it was unfair to ask that his opinion on such a subject should be circulated at the expense of the country. In his (Mr. A. Smith's) opinion, Sir Snow Harris was a high authority on such a subject, and as the noble Lord was ready to produce a Report from the Institute of Naval Architects, of which the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) was President, he thought the cost of laying before Parliament this and other papers, would be money well laid out. One reason given by the noble Lord for placing this School at South Kensington was that there were rooms and lecturers to be had there; but he (Mr. A. Smith) was informed that there were neither suitable rooms nor competent lecturers at South Kensington. The scheme propounded by the noble Lord ought not to be adopted until it was thoroughly examined, so that the House might see whether it was likely to prove successful, and what the cost was likely to be. Unless they had the whole plan before them, he was convinced that hereafter they would be called upon for some enormous expenditure. There existed schools in the dockyards already; it was only necessary that the education given there should be carried a little further than at present. He understood that there would be no objection to produce the Report from the Institute of Naval Architects, and therefore he would only move for "Copy of a Communication made to the Admiralty by Sir W. Snow Harris on the organization of the proposed School of Naval Architecture."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, Copy of a Communication made to the Admiralty by Sir W. Snow Harris on the organization of the proposed School of Naval Architecture,"—(Mr. A. Smith,)—instead thereof.

H

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he must protest against the assertion that he had at any time said anything derogatory of Sir Snow Harris, or that there was anything offensive to Sir Snow Harris in declining to accede to the request that the pamphlet written by that gentleman should be laid upon the table. He said that he had the highest opinion of Sir Snow Harris as a man of science, to whom the navy owed a great debt of gratitude for his system of lightning conductors, which was now in general use. But he repeated that Sir Snow Harris was no authority on the education of naval architects, and, therefore, had no claim whatever to have his opinions published at the public expense, any more than other persons had who chose to write upon a subject of public interest. At the same time, if the House should be of opinion that the circulation of these opinions were of public interest, he would, of course, produce them. On the other hand, the Institute of Naval Architects was a very important establishment, the object of which was to improve the system of naval architecture and the education of naval architects, and it would, therefore, be for the interests of this House, that their opinions should be laid upon the table. He had never said that the rooms at South Kensington were ready for the School. On the contrary, he had asked the House for a Vote of money in order to appropriate certain rooms for the purpose, and he believed that the sum voted would entirely cover the expenditure for the fitting up of those rooms. He had before expressed his opinion that it was much to be regretted that the former School of Naval Architecture had ever been given up. The present dockyard schools were not of a sufficiently high class, and could not bring out and educate naval architects in the higher scientific branches required by them at the present day; nor did there exist in the dockyards the means of giving the lectures which were required. At South Kensington, however, there were capable lecturers. [Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH: Who?] It was not necessary to name individuals, but there were eminent lecturers, who would be able to render great public service. The Government, therefore, decided that, upon the whole, South Kensington was the best place at which to establish the School. Upon the grounds he had stated, he should feel bound to oppose the Motion.

Mr. Augustus Smith

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON hoped his noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty would re-consider his determination, and not produce the papers on this subject until they were in a perfect state; because the papers which he had consented to produce would give a very imperfect view of the position in which this very interesting question now stood. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Augustus Smith) would not press for their production at present.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE complained that Captain Coles and other gentlemen who competed with the Constructor of the Navy were much obstructed by official obstacles, while the Constructor of the Navy was left to himself. The Royal Sovereign was nobody's child; yet if she should prove a failure, as very probably she would, the blame would be cast upon Captain Coles. He objected to the selection of South Kensington for the School. A naval school of architecture ought to be in a first-class port, where the whole process of construction would come under the eyes of the students.

MR. DILLWYN said, that the Government wanted to send everything to South Kensington, where they believed perfection reigned; but by the country at large the proposal to send the School of Naval Architecture there was looked on as simply ridiculous.

SIR JOHN TREVELYAN said, that Sir William Snow Harris was competent to give an opinion on this subject, and that his letter ought to be laid before the House.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he would advise his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion for the papers altogether, as the production of one portion of them was objected to by one side of the House, and the production of the remaining portion of them by the other side. As the Motion seemed to be considered premature at present, his hon. Friend could repeat it at a future time.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he would adopt the advice of his hon. and gallant Friend, and ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH—ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

The Controller of the Household reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of this House of May 3rd as follows:—

I have received your Address, praying that a Royal Commission may be issued to inquire into the provisions and operation of the Laws under which the Punishment of Death is now inflicted in the United Kingdom, and the manner in which it is inflicted, and to report whether it is desirable to make any alterations therein.

And I have given directions that a Commission shall issue for the purpose which you have requested.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—NAVAL ACTION OFF HELIGOLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, Whether the Government have received any information of a collision in the North Sea, off Heligoland, between the Austrian and Danish ships of war; and, if he has received any information, is it to the effect that the Austrians have got the worst of it?

SIR GEORGE GREY: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies received a telegram this afternoon at four o'clock from the Governor of Heligoland, in these words—

“Two o'clock, p.m.—Austrian squadron, consisting of two frigates and three gunboats, just engaging Danish squadron, consisting of two frigates and one corvette, six miles east of Heligoland. Result later.”

Since the House was sitting my right hon. Friend has received the following additional telegram from the Governor—

“Four o'clock, p.m.—Danes have won the action. One Austrian frigate is in flames, and she, together with the other Austrian frigate and gunboats, are making for Heligoland. They are almost in English water. The Aurora is here.”

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE ARMISTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: I understand that the conditions of the armistice have been communicated to another assembly. It seems to me that matters are not well managed or with due consideration to the House of Commons, if any other place is better informed than we are upon a matter of so much interest and importance as an armistice, and that we should be informed by the Government that they had no communication to make to us. I trust that in future we shall be as soon informed as another place upon matters of this importance. Perhaps by this time Her Majesty's Government may have it in their power to communicate to us what the conditions of the armistice are?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I stated all the information I had myself—which was that a suspension of hostilities, which is practically the same thing as an armistice, had been agreed upon for a month. That was all the information I had received at the time. My noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was at the Conference, and sent that information to me. It was impossible for him at the moment to communicate to me the terms of the armistice. I only regret that I did not know them at the time; but, as I stated, there could be no difficulty in communicating them at a future time. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I withheld no information from the House.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of them now?

ARMY—RATING OF OFFICERS OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL NORTH, who was almost inaudible, moved an Amendment with reference to the rates and taxes recently charged upon the officers resident in Chelsea Hospital in respect of houses therein officially occupied by them. The hon. and gallant Member was understood to urge that the long and gallant services of these gentlemen entitled them to every consideration.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to relieve the Officers of Her Majesty's Royal Hospital of Chelsea from the payment of all Rates and Taxes which have been charged upon them by a recent regulation for houses in that Hospital occupied by them in the performance of their duties,”—(Colonel North,)

—instead thereof.

MR. PEEL said, that the question brought forward by the hon. and gallant Gentleman was under consideration at the Treasury, in connection with the general question of the exemption of Government property from local taxation. He understood that no conclusion had been come to, but that the subject was still under the consideration of the Admiralty and War Office. The particular case of Chelsea Hospital had not been brought before the attention of the Treasury since 1858. The question whether official residences should be exempted or not from local rates was, of course, one of great importance to the parishes interested. There must be a beneficial occupation in order to render official residences liable to assessment; but it was not in his power to give a definition of what was to be considered a beneficial occupation. There was then the further question, whether the rates should be paid by the Government or the officers themselves, and a decision had been arrived at in favour of the latter course among other reasons, because it was deemed desirable that the emoluments of officers should be fixed and certain rather than be made up of such uncertain elements as free quarters, free from rates and local charges. The hon. and gallant Gentleman's Motion, moreover, went beyond the mere question of rates and applied to taxes. A similar question was raised in 1858, when an application was made to the Treasury on the subject of the House duty, and the decision arrived at in reference to that application was that, saving present appointments, the officers should pay the assessed taxes themselves. It appeared to him, indeed, that there was no better reason why the officers of Chelsea Hospital should not pay those taxes than why they should be exempt from the income tax, for the payment of which by them provision was made in the Act of Parliament.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that the residence of these officers in the Hospital was compulsory, and was necessary to the duty which was imposed upon them, and that they therefore ought not to be mulcted on that account. The argument, he observed, applied not only to Chelsea Hospital, but to every barrack in England. For his own part he did not think it right that, because the parish of Chelsea chose to levy high rates they ought to be thrown on those unfortunate officers, contrary to all right and justice. It was quite evident that the right hon. Gentleman knew nothing about the matter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman in saying that his right hon. Friend knew nothing about the matter, had gone somewhat beyond the ordinary licence of debate. The position of the officers in Chelsea Hospital did not appear to him to be precisely analogous to that of ordinary regimental officers residing in barracks. The former were rather to be regarded in the light of civil or public servants. Be that, however, as it might, the question involved in the discussion took a much wider scope than its bearing simply upon the Chelsea officers, and it appeared to him that the point of the liability of these gentlemen to pay rates ought to stand over for consideration until the general question had been brought to issue. If when that general question was decided, the hon. and gallant Gentleman still remained dissatisfied with the views of the Government, he would be in a position to ask the House to pronounce a judgment on the subject with greater advantage than at present.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, the question was one in which the Government, and the Government alone, were concerned. It was impossible that a parish would tax any Institution like that of Chelsea Hospital without the consent of the Government. If the Government gave up their rights, and said they would not defend such Institutions, it was quite obvious that the parishes might do as they pleased. A similar question had arisen in the case of Hampton Court Palace. The Government refused to oppose the demand, and the persons residing there had to pay their own taxes, whereas, in the case of St. James's Palace they had interfered and expressed a determination that it should not be made liable to rates. The charge, therefore, against the Government was that they had not performed their duty in defending Chelsea Hospital, and he trusted that his hon. and gallant Friend would go to a division on the subject.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the question was one which affected not only Chelsea Hospital but all the barracks in the Kingdom, and he hoped that his hon. Friend would press his Motion to a division. In Ireland a movement had been made to impose the rates upon barracks, and he understood that even the lodging money given to officers had been charged with income tax.

LORD NAAS said, it appeared by the Returns that no general rule existed with regard to these assessments; he therefore desired to know whether, before the House came to those Votes in the Civil Service Estimates which provided for the payment of rates, the Government would state the conclusion at which they had arrived upon this rather important question?

MR. COWPER said, that by law parishes had a right to rate all property which was beneficially occupied, and the Government could not prevent it from being rated. The residences of officers in Chelsea Hospital had been held to be property beneficially occupied, and therefore the parishes had a right to receive rates for them. The only question was, whether or not the Government should pay for the officers the rates which were legally due. The question was considered in 1858, and the Government then decided that all officers who were appointed after that date should pay their own rates, and that regulation had not been since departed from. As the whole subject was now under consideration, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had no reason to press his Motion.

The House divided:—Ayes 184; Noes 102: Majority 82.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

(1.) Original Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £750,870, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and the Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, inclusive."

Motion made, and Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £875,870, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and the Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, inclusive."

MR. MONSELL said, that the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) had stated that he intended to bring the subject of the Government manufacturing establishments under the consideration of the House: he therefore desired to ask the hon. Member if he could state when he would carry that intention into effect, as he (Mr. Monsell) thought he would be able to show that the manufacturing establishments had been the means of saving large sums of money to the public?

MR. COBDEN begged to state, in answer to the Question put to him by his right hon. Friend, that it was his intention to raise the whole question of Government manufacturing establishments, and he would bring it forward in such a form as to give his right hon. Friend an opportunity of showing that which he (Mr. Cobden) thought he would find it very difficult to do—namely, that these establishments had been a benefit to this country. He would try his chance by the ballot to-morrow, but at any rate would bring it forward at the earliest opportunity.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE reminded the noble Marquess the Under Secretary of State for War, that on Thursday last he had called his attention to the dilapidated condition of the stables and other buildings in the North Camp at Aldershot, and asked for some information upon the subject, but that the Chairman had been directed to report Progress before he received an answer. He would now repeat his request for information. He would also ask for some explanation of an item in the Vote for a naval store at Bermuda, which appeared to him rather a matter for the Naval Estimates.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY called the attention of the noble Marquess to the fact that there were in this Vote three items for the purchase of land, but no estimate of the cost was given. He also wished to know what were the powers possessed by the Secretary of State in respect to sales of land? The Committee would see that it was of great importance that no sale of public land should take place without being brought to the knowledge of the public by general advertisement. There had been a sale of land recently, of the site of the house and battery at Brighton, for £16,000, which was only made known through the Report of the Commissioners of Audit, to whose knowledge it came by accident, and of which sale there was no record in the War Office accounts. It was a singular transaction, and required the attention of the Government. It appeared that the solicitor of the War Office had sold this land, and, as he presumed, by the order of the Secretary for War, to a company, the original intention being that it should be exchanged for land belonging to the Woods and Forests Department. These transactions ought not to be allowed to pass without the knowledge of the House. He hoped also that the noble Marquess would be able to afford the House some prospect of a diminution of the expenditure at Aldershot.

Mr. C. P. F. BERKELEY said, that in justice to those hon. Members who had not been present on a former occasion, he would again call attention to some discrepancies which were unaccounted for; though he thought that it was but fair to the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War to state that those errors had not arisen alone during the period in which he had been in office, but that the system had been going on for some time. The reason why these discrepancies had not previously been pointed out by any hon. Member was because of the extreme difficulty of perceiving any alteration upon the face of the Estimates. The first Estimate for the drainage of Cove Common at Aldershot of £4,300 was originally £2,000. In 1862 the sum had grown to £2,150; in 1863 to £3,150, without any explanation of the cause of the increase being given, nor did they know where it was likely to stop. The estimate of £5,200 for improving the water supply at the same camp had increased by £1,800, the estimate last year for the same work being £3,400. The proposed cost of the cavalry barracks at Colchester had made a stride of £30,000 in one year, the estimate last year being £80,000, and this year £110,000. The re-form of the eastern defences at the Tower had increased £1,500 during the year, and the hydraulic engine house by £700. The new barracks at Chelsea, for which £187,000 were voted, had actually risen £47,000, the original estimate being £140,000. The erection of a new hospital at Netley, which last year was to cost £315,541, had increased to £328,079. He found that in 1862 there was also a very great increase upon that work, but a note was placed in the margin calling attention to the fact, and stating the reason; and he thought that that plan should always be adopted. When the estimate for the work of levelling and planting the grounds of that hospital was first framed they were to cost £1,200. In 1861 the estimate had increased to £2,000, in 1862 it was also £2,000, in 1863 it reached £2,100, and now it actually amounted to £4,000. In the cost of the quarters and stabling required for a detachment of Military Train the original estimate of £1,500 had not been increased; but they had already voted that amount, and a demand for another £1,500 was now made upon the House. In the case of the new powder magazine at Newcastle-on-Tyne they had already voted the estimated expense of the work, and yet they were asked for a further sum of £2,000. The same system was perceptible abroad. At King William's Town the estimate for the building of store accommodation had not been increased, but the money applied for had been raised from £1,000 to £1,500. The extension of the commissariat establishment at Gibraltar was estimated last year at £6,800, while this year it had reached £11,000, the original estimate being only £4,000. The erection of huts at Gibraltar had increased by £1,600, and the magazine accommodation at Nova Scotia by £1,000. There were many other items which he might have referred to, but he would not detain the Committee by going through them; he would simply state that there was upon these items an aggregate excess of £25,000, for which no explanation had been given, and it was the sum thus in excess upon the original Estimates which he proposed to negative. He also asked the noble Marquess how it was that no total estimate was given in the case of many of the Votes asked for, so that the Committee were kept altogether ignorant what money would be required in future years?

SIR HARRY VERNEY desired to point out that many of the works mentioned in the Estimates—such as those for improved drainage—might be performed by the soldiers themselves, and in this way not only would economy be practised, but—and this was a still more important object—the character and well-being of the men would thereby be improved. The greatest curse of our soldiers was the idleness in which they were kept; and he thought that after they had been taught their drill they ought to be employed in industrial capacities, thereby earning a little money for themselves, learning to perform duties with which foreign armies were perfectly familiar, and which would often save them from severe suffering in the field. With regard to Aldershot, he hoped the men would be removed as much as possible from that abominable village, where more injury was done to their morale than in any other place in Her Majesty's dominions. Unhappily barracks had been constructed close to the village; but during the summer a considerable number of soldiers might be removed from barracks and placed under canvas.

COLONEL NORTH said, he could not agree with the hon. Baronet in what seemed to be his assumption—namely, that drill should be a secondary consideration.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was aware that the proposal which the hon. Baronet had just made was a popular one; but he doubted whether it would meet with much favour from the soldiers themselves, who would feel that they had not enlisted for the purpose of performing such duties. He could not imagine what the Vote of £8,000 for removing the sewage from the Camp was for. He supposed that the farmers wanted the sewage, and, if so, let them take it away themselves. As to Aldershot, he deprecated the extraordinary outlay which had taken place there, and quite agreed that the soldiers ought to be removed. A regiment which had spent years in a foreign country was placed in one of these camps, where there was no amusement and where the men were exposed to horrible temptations. This was a great grievance, and the expenditure on these camps ought to be confined to the narrowest limits.

COLONEL SYKES said, there was no army in the world in which military pride was stronger than in the French army, and there was none in which so many works were performed by the soldiers. The French soldiers were not only employed in constructing fortifications, but they hutted themselves and built their own barracks; even the Sepoys built their own huts; and if in this country such works were made, as they might easily be made, an honourable occupation, and, at the same time, a source of profit, our soldiers would emulate the French in their devotion to industrial works. He wished to know how and by whom these Estimates were verified, and who gave the final fiat for their adoption? The French system of estimate and check was, undoubtedly, worthy of inquiry, if not of adoption. As an instance of the slovenly way in which these Estimates were presented, he would refer to an item for the "purchase of land and erection of rifle range, huts, &c., for 700 men," at Gravesend. The total Estimate for this was given at £64,000; the total amount already voted, £73,800; the gross sum already expended, £54,252; so that about £19,000 remained in hand; and yet the House was now asked to vote £2,000 more, while it was stated that £6,177 would be required to complete the work. Surely there must be some blundering here.

MR. BUXTON said, the point raised by the hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) was one of considerable importance, for it seemed absurd that they should have on the one hand bitter complaints because our soldiers had nothing to do, and on the other work suited to them done by contractors. As to the alleged unpopularity of this work, he believed that the men would be glad enough, in consideration of a little extra money, to be employed on works required in connection with the army. With regard to the Estimates, it seemed as if the Engineer Officers had fallen into the habit of making Estimates of about half or two-thirds the real sum; committing Parliament to their adoption, and then coming up to the House for supplementary Votes. Lord Hardinge had told him that, on taking office, he found an order of the Duke of Wellington to the effect that whenever a new building was erected there should be placed upon it a brass plate, stating the original estimate, the actual cost, the time in which it was completed, and the name of the officer who had designed it.

GENERAL PEEL said, it would probably be found that the blame did not attach entirely to the Engineer Officers. Estimates of this kind were generally cut down at the War Office, the great object being to reduce them within a certain amount. He always impressed everybody at the War Office that the worst thing they could do was to attempt to deceive the House of Commons; but the root of the evil lay in the piling down of Estimates by the House of Commons, which necessitated subsequent augmentations. In regard to the circumstance that the sum named in the original Estimate for the purchase of land at Gravesend was £64,000, and the sum already voted was £73,000, he might explain that the money spent in the course of the financial year went back to the Exchequer. The gross sum actually expended was £54,000, and this was, no doubt, the cause of the discrepancy. He thought it would be better if there were a column to show in such cases the amount of the original estimate. He had always held that it was useless to compare the Estimates of one year with those of another unless they knew the actual expenditure.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to urge upon the noble Lord most strongly that the system of giving employment to the soldiers should be adopted throughout the army. They had been set to work at Aldershot with the best results. The work was admirably done, and at no great cost, while the physical condition of the men was much improved. The best way of taking the soldier out of the way of the diseases of which they heard so much was by giving him constant and healthy employment. He believed that the experiment had been also successfully tried at Plymouth, and he trusted that it would be carried out with vigour.

COLONEL NORTH quite agreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken. He regretted that in a Vote of more than £300,000 so small a sum as £5,000 only was set aside for "reading and recreation rooms." Most of the soldier's idle time was in the evening, and if his barrack rooms were made more comfortable and lit with gas he would not be so anxious to leave them. At present the Government gave two wretched candles to light a large room; and who would not prefer a gin palace to such a place? A young officer of artillery deserved great credit for having established a reading room for the troops at Gibraltar, at first at his own expense. The plan had been found most successful, and had been approved both by the late Lord Herbert and Sir George Lewis. He wished the Vote for reading and recreation were four or five times as large.

Mr. W. EWART said, he would also have been glad to see a larger item for reading and recreation. Remembering how fond the French soldiers were of gardens, and how healthfully and innocently they were employed in taking care of them, he could not help wishing that the English soldier, too, could have his little garden at the camp. He was glad to see an item of £4,000 for gymnasia, and thought that these establishments might be extended greatly for the benefit of the army.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the readiness with which the House voted everything the soldier did not want was remarkable. With regard to sales of land by the War Department, he had known some extraordinary proceedings to take place. When he was at the Ordnance, land could not be sold without the leave of the Treasury; but he had known that land had been sold very cheaply which the Government had to buy back a few years afterwards at three or four times its former price. It was time the House should be informed what was to be done with Aldershot. Was it to be a barrack for 15,000 or 30,000 men, or a camp of instruction, as it was originally intended to be? The wooden huts were becoming decayed, and it would soon be necessary either to renew them or replace them by something else. If huge barracks were to be built, the House ought to know how much was to be laid out upon them. The same questions might be put in regard to the Curragh. The drill ground at Aldershot was one vast mass of dust. No doubt the men might be set to work, and even had been; but their employment, for which they must be paid, would be frequently interrupted by the duties and drill of a camp of instruction. A soldier who had been out for four or five hours with 50lb. to 60lb. on his back would be in no condition for work. No one could oppose making the soldier more comfortable, but it must be recollected that a barrack was not a private house, and that he gave up many of the comforts of private life when he entered the army, and he doubted whether the House was not now running into too great an extreme in the direction advocated by hon. Members opposite. Many of the difficulties which the noble Marquess had to contend with arose, no doubt, from the mass of work to be transacted in his Department, and of which he was supposed to give explanations; in fact, he was astonished that the noble Lord should be able even to keep in his head so many subjects connected with a profession to which he had never been bred, though he could scarcely be expected to be able to give detailed answers about them; but, even at the risk of adding to his duties, he must request some explanation on the subject of fortifications, which seemed to be erected everywhere except in Ireland. In the present year, it seemed to be stated that £30,000 was to be spent there under that head out of a total Imperial expenditure of £2,500,000. The Defence Committee recommended that the fortifications of the south and south-west of Ireland should be put into a state of repair, and the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland had supported that recommendation; yet there was Bantry Bay, where, little more than sixty years since, the French attempted to land—a place which would also be very convenient for America if she took it into her head to attack us—left without any means whatever of resistance.

Enormous sums were expended on small batteries in England, useless except for practising purposes; while in Ireland, through which this country could be just as successfully attacked, the existing fortifications were allowed to crumble to pieces. A nobleman (Lord Charles Clinton) who had purchased land in that country, and was interesting himself in this subject, forwarded to the Government extracts from the published opinions of the Defence Committee, and also a statement of the views entertained by General Sir George Brown as to the necessity of those defences, and the benefit that would arise to the people by the employment these repairs would give; but the answer he received, after repeated applications, was, that to carry out the works referred to would confer no real benefit on the people of Ireland, inasmuch as the Government would be obliged to employ skilled artificers. In the end, they employed neither skilled nor unskilled labourers, and the defences remain in their old condition. He protested against the doctrine that England, while levying money for these special objects of fortification, and refusing to spend any in Ireland, was entitled to tax Ireland for the purpose.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that since Thursday night he had made inquiries as to the state of the buildings in the North Camp at Aldershot, and was unable to find that any report had been received at all bearing out the description given the other night by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Petersfield (Sir Wm. Jolliffe) of their ruinous condition. If the right hon. Gentleman would look at Part 3 of the present Vote, he would see that no less than £22,440 were taken for repairs of the camp at Aldershot. The huts were not by any means comfortable quarters—that did not admit of doubt—but their discomfort, he thought, was attributable to the situation and other causes, which no amount of money spent upon them would be able to remedy, rather than to their condition. He was not aware of any intention to alter existing arrangements there. The Government did not propose to take any sum of money for new buildings, except for stabling of a more permanent character; and the Vote for this purpose did not appear for the first time in the present Estimates, money having been taken in 1861-2 and 1862-3. Last year the works were temporarily suspended, but would now be resumed; and the importance of their completion had been shown by the disastrous fire which took place in one of the temporary stables, where, through the flimsy and dangerous character of the materials, a number of valuable horses were destroyed. Hon. Members would see that, in the Vote under consideration, an attempt had been made to give the House much fuller and more detailed information than usual; but it was impossible at all times to obtain precise information, and, therefore, the original Estimates were sometimes exceeded. The drainage of Cove Common had proved more costly than was expected, but the reason was because a larger quantity of ground had been drained than was at first contemplated. It might, perhaps, have been desirable to append a note stating that the Vote asked for would only cover a portion of the expense; but such a practice, if adopted, would necessitate very minute detail. In the formation of reservoirs, the nature of the ground and the extent of embankment could not be determined till the work was commenced, and he was assured that in such cases approximate estimates were seldom to be depended upon. He was afraid he could not give the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) any more distinct explanation of the circumstances connected with the transfer of the plot of ground at Brighton, than he had already received. An arrangement had been sanctioned by the Treasury under which the War Department were to exchange certain lands for others in the possession of the Woods and Forests, the value being in the first instance ascertained by a person mutually agreed on. The plot in question was valued at £9,000, and the War Department, thinking that estimate too low, made inquiries, and ascertained that a hotel company were willing to pay £16,000 for it. The Woods and Forests, being informed of this circumstance, replied that they were unwilling to give that amount, but if the War Department would negotiate the sale, offered to give a corresponding quantity of land. A certain sum of money was taken from the hotel company as security while the purchase was being completed, and was placed for a short time in the hands of the Accountant General at the War Office, by which means it was made to appear on the books of the department. He was not aware of anything irregular in the practice, which had been sanctioned by the Treasury. As regarded lands belonging to the Crown which could be devoted to purposes of defence, or used for purposes connected with the army, they were vested for the time being in the Secretary of State. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. C. P. Berkeley) had repeated some of the observations he made the other evening with reference to the total estimates of cost having been exceeded in several items. He (the Marquess of Hartington) had given a short explanation when the subject was last under discussion, and he would not now follow the hon. Member through all the items he had mentioned. The most important item had reference to the cavalry barracks at Colchester, the estimates for which had been increased by a sum of from £20,000 to £30,000. This increase was owing to an alteration in the plan, and the great rise in the price of labour and materials. The barracks were made larger than had been at first contemplated, and higher prices on the new portion had to be paid than those on the first stage of the works. He admitted it would be very desirable that, either by marginal notes or some other mode, the Committee should have a more complete knowledge of the facts where original estimates were departed from, and the reasons which had led to that departure. He should be sorry to pledge himself to have the Estimates prepared in any particular form next year, but he would promise that the subject should be considered. He could assure the Committee that he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) who said that it was the worst policy in the world to attempt to deceive the House of Commons; first, because it was impossible to do so; and next, it was not desirable to do so even if it were possible. With reference to the purchase of land for a rifle range at Gravesend, it had been found that the land it was originally proposed to purchase was not of sufficient extent to render the rifle range safe; it therefore became absolutely necessary to purchase more land. With regard to Netley, the original estimate was £1,500; that sum had been already voted, but it had been spent on other works which were more urgent, and the same sum was now again asked this year. The increase in the hydraulic engine house at the Tower was occasioned by a slight alteration in the works, in order to provide rooms for the person in charge, which would save £20 a year in future. The alteration would also add to the ornamental character of the works. At Netley the increase was almost entirely owing to the changes which had taken place in the character of the building. When the plans and details of a building were materially altered the expense was naturally increased. If these things were fully explained in the Estimate he was afraid a large portion of it must be filled with marginal notes. The only sum for new works in the whole of this Estimate was £2,000 for the conversion of the barracks at Haslar into an hospital. With respect to the naval store at Bermuda, he had been asked why that should be provided for by the War Department. The War Department furnished the naval service with all warlike stores required, and not only were ships furnished with those stores, but the stations for providing accommodation for warlike stores of that description for the use of ships of war. With respect to the excess in the Vote for the works at Gibraltar, if there was any, it must be small, and could not be considered extravagant on so large a Vote as the original Estimate. It might also be accounted for by the fact, that when the Estimate was framed the Vote for the transport service connected with the works was undertaken by the Commissariat Department. No doubt it was quite true that sometimes in the War Office the estimates of the Engineers were cut down by striking out the charges for works which were not indispensably necessary; but the Engineers' estimate for that portion of the work which was to be carried out was invariably adhered to. The hon. Gentleman complained that no total was given of the sum which would be required in the future for regimental chapels, schools, &c.; but he thought the Committee would see that no total of the future expenditure could be given under this head. It would be impossible for the Secretary for War to say what he might have to ask in future years, as that must depend on circumstances. The same observation applied to the married soldiers' quarters. The Committee was aware that in the old barracks that kind of accommodation was extremely deficient; but it would be impossible to say at the present time to what extent improvement in that respect was to be carried. That must depend very much upon the temper of future Houses of Commons, and the amount of funds made available for that purpose. As regarded reading and recreation rooms, in a great number of barracks such rooms had been built, or apartments had been appropriated to reading and recreation; and the £5,000 asked for in the present Estimates would go a long way in the matter. It would not, however, be well to act too hastily without further experience, and to at once set up reading and recreation rooms after one fashion in every barracks at home and abroad. With respect to the employment of soldiers at trades, there could be no doubt that such employment, where it could be carried out, was very useful to the soldier, and an experiment would be made as to its practicability; but it would be only as an experiment, because there was some apprehension that the discipline of the army might be imperilled by such a course. Last year a great many soldiers were employed at Aldershot in connection with water works, road making, and to some extent in building. He hoped they would be employed to a still greater extent, for it was beyond doubt most beneficial to the soldier that he should be employed. In some instances, too, a saving was effected by employing soldiers; but in some kinds of work engineers would tell them that military labour was not the most economical. However, employment at trades was decidedly most beneficial for the soldiers themselves, and, as far as possible, it would be resorted to. With regard to the question put to him by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne) on the subject of fortifications in Ireland, he would remind the Committee that the principle upon which our scheme of fortifications was to be carried out was not that of defending the whole coast of Great Britain and Ireland, but that of refusing the enemy access to those points which were considered vulnerable. Our dockyards and arsenals, and the harbours in which our ships of war would take shipping, were the points to which the attention of our engineers was directed; but it never had been proposed to fortify the whole coast of the United Kingdom, so as to render it impossible that an enemy could ever attempt to land on our shores. A considerable sum of money had been expended upon the works at Spike Island, and other works were to be erected, he believed, at the mouth of Cork harbour. So far as Ireland was concerned, the recommendations of the Defence Committee were being entirely carried out.

COLONEL BARTHELOT congratulated the noble Lord on his explanation, and appealed to the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. C. P. F. Berkeley) to withdraw his Amendment. He, however, thought that there ought to be a statement in the Estimates as to where the money for sanitary purposes and for married soldiers' quarters was to be expended. He had to call the attention of the noble Lord to the disgraceful state of the Clarence Barracks at Portsmouth. They were not fit to put a regiment into. Formerly they were barracks for Marines; but they were condemned thirty or forty years ago by the Admiralty, and had been sold because they were unfit for the Marines; but they were now turned into permanent barracks for our soldiers. The officers' quarters and the men's rooms were both bad, and the place in which the meat was stored was placed in the immediate neighbourhood of the most offensive smells, and it would be impossible to keep the meat sweet for a day in summer. With regard to Aldershot, he knew the feeling of commanding officers to be that, while it was a very good thing to have troops there in summer, in winter it was a very bad place, both for their young officers and their men, and that there ought to be regular barracks for the winter months.

MR. C. P. F. BERKELEY thought the first step towards any sound economy was that these accounts should be rendered in an accurate and distinct form to the House; but after the assurance given for the future on that point by the noble Lord, he would withdraw his Motion.

COLONEL NORTH hoped that something would really be done in regard to the state of the Portsmouth barracks which had been alluded to.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY thought the Committee must feel obliged to the noble Marquess for his able answers to the numerous questions put to him, and which might well embarrass any one. As to the sale of public property, however, the noble Marquess had overlooked the main point—namely, that so large a sum as £16,000 should have been received for public property, and yet that there should be no record of that expenditure in any authorized document. No Government Department ought to have the power of selling public property without first duly advertising the sale, and then accounting for it in some authentic public record.

COLONEL SYKES complained that the accounts had not been satisfactorily explained yet; there was a mystification in them.

MR. MONSELL said, it was utterly impossible that the exact sum taken every year could be spent. For instance, there was a strike among the workmen engaged on a particular work, a portion of the money voted would have to be re-paid into the Exchequer. With regard to the large sum being spent in fortifying Halifax, Nova Scotia, the other day one of Her Majesty's ships was obliged to ask permission to go into a dry dock at Boston, because we had no dock of our own on that coast. It was absolutely necessary, especially in the present state of the world, that the money being laid out at Halifax should be made as available for its purpose as possible, and that proper means for refitting our ships should be provided in that quarter.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he did not think the explanation with regard to expenditure for the defences of Ireland was at all satisfactory. Large sums were voted for the defence of the Humber and other places in England, where there were no docks or arsenals, while the defence of the coast of Ireland was neglected. These commercial ports should contribute something towards the cost of their own defence. Bantry Bay was a most dangerous part of the Irish coast, and all the defence of Ireland ought not to be confined to Cork. Unless justice were done to Ireland in this matter he would formally bring the question before the House.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought that some further explanation was required in reference to the Vote.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.) 173,883, Military Education.

MR. MAGUIRE: I am compelled, Sir, by the conduct of the Governors of the Royal Hibernian Military School, to bring before the Committee a subject which, whatever it may appear at the first glance, is one of very grave importance, not only to the Catholic people of Ireland, but to the public service. It is not my fault that this matter should be now brought before Parliament—it is the fault of those who have been appealed to in vain for redress. By the last census the population of Ireland consisted of 4,500,000 Catholics, and about 1,200,000 Protestants and Presbyterians. Now, it is well known that the great majority of those who enlist in the

Colonel Sykes

Queen's service in Ireland are Catholics—that for every single Protestant or Presbyterian who enters the British army, there are at least five Catholics. The reason is obvious. The Protestants, for instance, are not usually of the class who most readily yield to the seductions of the recruiting officer, while the Catholics form the bulk of the population, and are to a considerable extent of the class most liable to enlist. It is therefore strange and unaccountable that in the only establishment for the education and care of the orphan children of Irish soldiers, the proportion of Catholics and Protestants should stand thus:—By a Return dated the 27th of February, 1861, the boys in the school numbered 410, of whom 278 were Protestants and 132 were Catholics. Since then the disproportion has increased, for at present the school contains 283 Protestant boys, and only 127 Catholics. For a public institution in a Catholic country this is a most unjust and unsatisfactory state of things, and for which I find it impossible to account on any reasonable ground. Considering the class and creed from which the army is recruited in Ireland, the proportion between Catholic and Protestant children is most unfair. I cannot understand why the children of Catholic soldiers are not as much entitled to sympathy and protection as the children of Presbyterian or Protestant soldiers; for no one will deny that the Catholic soldiers are as brave and devoted as those of any other creed, or that they shed their blood as lavishly in defence of the flag under which they serve. In the name, then, of the Catholic people of Ireland, of the Catholic soldiers of the army, and of those who still look to Ireland as one of the most valuable recruiting grounds for the British army, I appeal to the House for a change in the constitution and management of this institution. The disproportion of less than one-third Catholics to two-thirds Protestants is bad enough, but it is by no means the worst. A greater injustice arises from the constitution of the teaching staff. In 1861, there were sixty-nine persons holding offices of various kinds in this establishment—these offices ranging from the very highest to the very lowest—from those of the greatest authority to those of the most inferior position. And of these sixty-nine persons, only one, holding anything like a position of authority or influence, was a Catholic—that was the Catholic clergyman. The dispenser of medicine was also a Catholic; but he could hardly be said to be one likely to have much control over the management of the institution. Thus out of sixty-nine persons holding office, but nine were Catholics, and of these nine but two—the officiating clergyman and the dispenser of medicines—held the position of a gentleman, the other seven filling the humblest offices in the household. The entire teaching staff was Protestant then, and is Protestant now, and this in an institution in which some one-third of the scholars are Catholics—the children of Catholic soldiers! That teaching staff consists of four masters, four assistant masters, and ten monitors—all Protestants. The Protestant Chaplain is the resident, while the Officiating Catholic Clergyman is not. The one is always on the spot, the other is only permitted to attend on certain days, and for a limited time, as I will show. Now, not only is the Protestant Chaplain resident, but all the officers having authority and influence are likewise resident. The Protestant children are instructed in the Catechism of the Church of England daily; it is part of the duty of the masters to teach them that which is considered by each church to be the foundation of the belief of a Christian. The Protestant boy is carefully taught the principles of his religion; but the Catholic boy is necessarily neglected. The Protestant boy is taught his catechism daily; but the Catholic children can be instructed only three times a week in the truths of their religion. The Catholic clergyman lives three miles away from the school, and is only allowed to attend in it for an hour on Wednesday, two hours on Saturday, and two hours on Sunday—five hours altogether in the week! This surely is not a fair protection to the faith of the Catholic child, the orphan of the Catholic soldier. Here, then, is a school in which there are 127 Catholic boys of tender years, everything else is Protestant—the officers of rank, authority, and influence are Protestant, the teaching staff is Protestant, and the books are Protestant. The books—histories, for instance—are not those which are used in the National Schools of Ireland, or, in other words, in schools in which the mixed system is taught, and in which there are supposed to be children of different religious denominations. In the Session of 1861, I brought this matter before the House, and on that occasion two Members of the Government expressed opinions unfavourable to the state of things then shown to exist, and which state of things continues to this hour. The present Colonial Secretary was then Secretary for Ireland, and he agreed with what fell from the then Under Secretary for War (Mr. Baring), who “thought it was a pity that more Roman Catholics were not employed in the management of the school.” The then Irish Secretary (Mr. Cardwell) used these words—

“The institution was now to be regarded as a public establishment maintained for the general benefit of the Queen’s Irish subjects serving in the field.”

And he added—

“He must express his cordial concurrence in the wish expressed by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary at War, that as vacancies occurred among the officers, they should be filled up solely with a view to the objects for which the school was supported, and that no selections should be made with the intention of favouring any one class in the community.”

Some time ago I was distinctly promised that the next vacancy in the teaching staff should be filled up by a Roman Catholic. But how was that expectation, that promise realized? It was filled up by one who was the son of Catholic parents, who was registered as a Catholic, but who, having been given to one of the Protestant teachers as his servant, succumbed to the influences of the school, and became a Protestant. This lad was then sent to the military school at Athlone, and he was afterwards brought back, in the capacity of a master, to the school which he had entered as a Catholic, and in which he was induced to change his faith. What worse example than this could be set to a Catholic child? What more direct encouragement to proselytizing could have been afforded than by that appointment? If I am asked where are the evil consequences resulting from the character of the institution, the teaching staff, and the instruction, I point to the flagrant case I have mentioned as one proof; and I add to that the fact that in a few years, from 1851 to 1858, as many as 22 Catholic boys abandoned the faith of their parents and became Protestants. I said the books were not—some of them at least—such as the Government permitted to be used in the mixed schools in Ireland. Mr. Gleig’s historical works, however suited for Protestant children, and notwithstanding their ability, are not the books I should place in the hands of a Catholic boy, unless I desired to destroy his respect for his faith and his church. It is not fair to use such books in a mixed school; but, as the Committee will see, works of a far different character are introduced into this asylum for the training and protection of the children of Irish soldiers. Tracts of the most aggressive and offensive character are allowed to be circulated, not only amongst Protestant but amongst Catholic boys. As many as 22 of these pestilent productions—some of them written by pious fools, perhaps more of them written by lying knaves—were found in the hands of Catholic boys; and not only do these tracts poison the minds of the Protestant boys against their fellow pupils of another faith—by whose side they might stand at some future day in deadly fight, and whom they should learn to love and not to hate—but they are attended with the most mischievous effects on the Catholic boys, and are even calculated to weaken their belief in all revealed religion. Let the House judge of the character and influence of these tracts from a very few examples. One found in the hand of a Catholic boy, named George Fennell, contained the following:—"Popery is the most perfect contrivance of the devil for leading souls to hell." That, at least, is mild and tolerant. Another line—"Popery is as bitter an enemy to the truth as ever." Here is another passage—

"The people of Ephesus worshipped a goddess, whom they called Diana. The idolators of Rome at the present day do the very same thing."

What can be thought of the officers of an institution supported by the State—supported out of taxes to which Catholics contribute their share—in which such works are circulated amongst young boys of different religious denominations, and who should be suffered to grow up together in amity? As a further indication of the character and tone of this school in which we find 127 helpless Catholic children, I may briefly refer to a case that occurred in the summer of 1861. An orderly sergeant named Harrison when on his deathbed desired to see the Catholic clergyman. Every possible obstruction was opposed to the wish of the dying man. Urged by Harrison's wife, the Rev. Mr. Leonard endeavoured to see him, but in vain. Having applied to several officials for an order of admission, he at length procured one from Sir George Brown; but, though possessing that order, he was kept at the door of the establishment for one hour and twenty minutes, and was not allowed to cross the threshold until Harrison breathed his last! It is only fair to say that the Lord Lieutenant, true to his character as a man of liberality and justice, wrote a minute in which the conduct of certain officials was rebuked. Lord Carlisle is not one who is likely to rebuke severely; but his opinion was pronounced with sufficient distinctness. He said "he considered the detention of the Rev. Mr. Leonard at the gate of the hospital as most unfortunate." That minute is important for this additional reason, that it pointed out to Mr. Leonard the course he should take for the future. It concludes with these words—

"The Rev. Mr. Leonard would, however, do well to bear in mind, that upon any future occasion, when he may see reason to complain of the conduct or proceedings of any officer of the institution, he should in the first instance apply for redress to the Governors of the School."

Let the Committee now see what the Rev. Mr. Leonard gained by following that proper advice. At the desire of his spiritual superior, the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen, he addressed a respectful and earnest statement and remonstrance to the Board, in which he urged the necessity for appointing a Catholic teacher for the Catholic boys, and which he fortified by the recorded opinions of Mr. Cardwell and Mr. Baring in its favour. The answer was in this sneering fashion—

"Adjutant General's Office, Royal Hospital, Dublin, May 22nd, 1862.

"Sir,—I am directed by Sir George Brown to acknowledge the receipt (yesterday evening) of your letter of the 19th instant, in which you are pleased to favour the General with your opinion as to the most judicious mode of selecting teachers for the Royal Hibernian Military School.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant, (Signed) "G. S. BROWNAGE, Deputy.

"The Rev. John Leonard,
R. H. M. School, St. Bridget's Blanchardstown."

Mr. Leonard is a man not to be driven from his purpose by a sneer, and, like any one who has a good cause to defend, he determined to persevere. Not finding redress from the Governors he turned to the War Office. Nothing daunted by his rebuff from Sir George Brown, Mr. Leonard appealed to the late lamented Secretary for War, Sir George Lewis, than whom there was not an abler public servant or a juster man; but as the War Office has really no jurisdiction—and this is a point of great moment—he was referred back to the Governors, by whom he was treated with contempt. This was his answer from the War Office—

“War Office, 18th June, 1862.

“REV. SIR,—In reply to your letter of 29th ultimo, addressed to the Secretary to the Council of Military Education, I am directed by Secretary Sir George Lewis to acquaint you, that though the actual appointments alluded to in your letter are not precisely specified, it is assumed that they are such as are comprehended in the Charter granted to the Royal Hibernian School, dated 14th December, 1846, which vests the power of appointment to certain offices in the Governors of the institution. I am therefore to state, that your application should be made to the Governors, instead of the Council of Military Education.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

“EDWARD LUGARD,

Blanchardstown, Dublin.

I confess, Sir, that my blood boiled when after reading the respectful, calm, full, and comprehensive statements and remonstrances of the Rev. Mr. Leonard, I observed the scornful and contemptuous manner in which that gentleman on all occasions was answered. At one time—in answer to grave statements and earnest appeals—he was told that he was going beyond his province; at another he was told that he was dictating to the Board; at another, he was threatened with suspension; and on all occasions the replies he received, whether written or oral, were contradictory, vacillating, and imperious. The last reply was given in the month of April this year; but no redress, or hope of redress, whatever. I have no hesitation in saying that the conduct thus wilfully pursued by the Governors of the Royal Hibernian Military School is pernicious in itself, bad as an example, and most prejudicial to the service of the Queen. Let it be known that Catholic children were proselytized in this school, that apostates from the Catholic faith have been selected in preference to Catholic teachers, that no protection is given to the orphan children of men who shed their blood in defence of this country, and the number of enlistments in Ireland, already very small, will speedily become much less. I believe the Lord Lieutenant and the Government are willing to do justice, but they are powerless in the matter. Parliament, however, is not so; and if the charter of the school does not give sufficient power to the Government, it can be altered. The House is asked this year to vote upwards of £11,000 for the support of the Hibernian School. The officials, therefore, are public servants, and should be amenable to public control; and, if they wrap themselves up in their bigotry and folly, they must be made to feel that they cannot be allowed to stand in the way of the interests of the Empire and the service of Her Majesty. I hope the Under Secretary for War, who is a just and generous man, will give full and free expression to his opinion, so that an end may be put to an intolerable grievance; but if justice be not done before next Session, and if these gentlemen will not do that voluntarily which they will otherwise be compelled to do against their will, I, Sir, should no other Member propose it, will move for either a Commission or a Select Committee to consider the constitution of the school, and the necessity for altering its charter.

MR. VANCE said, that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) had moved this Session for some elaborate Returns connected with the Royal Hibernian School. In those Returns it was proposed to embrace statements as to the religion of the teachers and the boys at the school, as well as other minute particulars which he believed it was not in accordance with the practice of the House to have furnished. But, be that as it might, he had been awaiting the production of those papers, and had not for a moment supposed that the hon. Member would have substituted for them Returns of his own. [Mr. MAGUIRE: It is on Returns presented by order of this House that I mainly rely.] Yes; Returns for 1861, which were not at all the same as those for which the hon. Member had moved, and into the examination of which he had meant to enter during the Whitsuntide recess, not at all imagining that in their absence the subject would have been brought forward that evening. As, however, it had been brought forward, he might take that opportunity of saying that he knew the Governors of the institution in question, and that a more honourable or high-minded body of men did not exist. The school, he might add, was a military school; the boys in it were intended for the most part for Her Majesty's service; and if a conflict of opinion on sectarian matters were allowed to prevail there, a spirit of insubordination would be likely to be produced, not only among the teachers, but the taught. The school as it stood, he believed, was working admirably, and it would be dangerous to introduce novel experiments. He hoped that before the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War pledged himself to make any organic change in it he would take pains duly to inform himself whether the Governors, in the course which they had pursued, had not proceeded on just and proper grounds.

COLONEL NORTH said, he had listened with the utmost surprise to the statements which had been made by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire). He took it for granted that the school was equally open to Roman Catholics and to Protestants; and that being the case he could not understand how, in a country, the majority of the inhabitants of which were Roman Catholics, only one-third of the scholars should be Roman Catholics, and all the orderlies of one religion—the Protestant. During the time he served in the army, he had, for the most part, been connected with regiments which were composed chiefly of Roman Catholics, one of the last being the Royal Irish Fusiliers, in which, out of 1,000 men, there were not more than seventy or eighty Protestants; and he defied any man to point out an instance in which the Roman Catholic soldier in those regiments had not done his duty most nobly, led by Protestant officers, in the service of a Protestant Queen. It was, therefore, much to be regretted that in an institution like the Royal Hibernian School, any marked difference should be made between the members of the two persuasions.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he had to thank the hon. Member for Dungarvan for the very temperate manner in which he had introduced the subject to the notice of the House, which was undoubtedly a very important one. The hon. Gentleman had very fairly stated that the Secretary of State had no power to interfere directly with the management of the institution in question. He was prepared, at the same time, to admit, that as a sum of £12,000 appeared in the Army Estimates for its support, it was but right that the representative of the War Department should be called upon to account for the expenditure of that money. Sir George Lewis, he might add, having inquired into the subject, had come to the conclusion indicated by the letter to which the hon. Member referred, and the charter of the institution set forth, in the most distinct terms, that the control of the school should be vested in certain Governors, who should have power to appoint the officers and teachers, the discretion vested in the Secretary of State having relation simply to the salary which those officers should receive. That being so, the hon. Member complained that not only were certain books made use of in the school for the purposes of education to which he, as a Roman Catholic, objected, but that religious tracts of a controversial character had been introduced, and were freely circulated among the boys. Now, into the character of the books employed in the educational course he would not enter; but he must say, that having looked over some of the extracts to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, he could not see that there was in them anything very objectionable. But, however that might be, it was for the Governors of the school, and not for the House of Commons, to determine what books should be used in the ordinary course of instruction. Then as to the charge that controversial tracts were freely circulated in the school, that, no doubt, was a very serious charge; but he felt bound to say that he did not think it had been substantiated. Earl De Grey and Lord Carlisle having heard what Colonel Wynyard, the commandant of the establishment—in whose veracity every one who knew him was aware the utmost reliance might be placed—had to say on the subject in reply to the appeal of Mr. Leonard, had come to the conclusion that the explanation was perfectly satisfactory. Colonel Wynyard stated that the rule of the institution was, that no boy should be permitted to give his Bible or religious books to any other boy who was not of the same persuasion, and it was posted up in the hospital that severe punishment would follow the breach of this regulation; and he distinctly stated that in the two years and a half during which he had been commandant, only two cases of such an exposure of tracts as Mr. Leonard alleged had taken place in twenty-two instances had been recorded, and that with those cases he had duly dealt. If, he might add, Mr. Leonard had discovered the tracts which he mentioned, was it not his duty, before advancing so grave a charge as he had done against Colonel Wynyard, to inform him that certain books had been found in the school, and to afford him an opportunity of inquiring how it was they had got there? Colonel Wynyard only knew of two cases, and in those Mr. Leonard brought the facts to his notice in such a manner that it was difficult to deal with the offenders. Instead of taking the books to Colonel Wynyard, Mr. Leonard had sent them to Archbishop Cullen, and thus the Commandant had not the opportunity of ascertaining its real character. Nevertheless, in both cases, the order which he had just read was vindicated. Upon this explanation and other evidence, the Governors came to the conclusion that Colonel Wynyard had completely exonerated himself from the charges made against him, and Lord Carlisle had in a minute expressed himself satisfied. With many of the other remarks of the hon. Member he agreed, and he fully concurred in all that was said three years ago by the then Under Secretary for War and his right hon. Friend now Secretary of State for the Colonies. The explanation given by Sir George Brown of the absence of Roman Catholic teachers was, that the Governors never inquired into the religion of the candidates, but had in all cases appointed the man whom they thought best fitted for the appointment. He had no doubt that that explanation was perfectly true, but to him it was not satisfactory. He thought that the principle upon which the Governors had acted was an erroneous one. He thought that in a country like Ireland, where so many of the pupils were Roman Catholics, the Governors ought to inquire into the religion of the candidates, and to take care that a certain proportion of the teachers should be Roman Catholics. Earl De Grey held the same opinions as were expressed three years ago by Mr. Baring and his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies; and, indeed, he had caused Sir George Brown to be informed that, though the War Department had no power of interfering with the conduct of the institution, yet unless a fair and just course was pursued towards the Roman Catholic children, it would be impossible either for him to defend the institution or for him (the Marquess of Hartington), who was the representative of the Military Department in the House of Commons, and answerable for the expenditure of the money voted for the Department, to defend it there. Further than that it was impossible for the Secretary of State to go. It was possible that the Governors might refuse to take the advice which had been given to them, and in that case it would be competent to the hon. Member, or any of his Friends, to move for an inquiry into the system. He trusted and hoped, however, that after it had been pointed out to Sir George Brown, who he was sure had in this instance, as in all others, no desire except to do his duty, that the principle upon which the Governors were acting was not a right one, and that they ought in fairness to consider the religion of Roman Catholics as a qualification for appointment as teachers, both he and the other Governors would act upon the suggestion, and that in future Roman Catholic parents would have no reason to fear for the faith of their children who belonged to this school.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, that with every desire to give credit to the hon. Member for Dungarvan for honest zeal, he thought that it would have been better if he had told the Committee that although complaints had been made as to the introduction of controversial tracts into this school, they had not been substantiated, except in two isolated cases. He had heard with surprise the speech of the noble Lord opposite, and he must say that before the noble Lord went the length of inferring censure on Sir George Brown and the Governors of the Institution, he ought to have satisfied himself that there was sufficient reason for doing so. In justice to those who had the management of the school, it was only right to assume that if they had not acted upon the advice of the Government it was because they had good reasons for adhering to the old system. No one had cast the slightest doubt upon the efficiency, value, and excellence of the school. The school was popular with the army, and he had not heard of any complaints of its management having been made by those most interested in it. Why, then, should a change be made; and why should the masters be altered simply and solely that some of them might be Roman Catholics? Had the noble Lord fully considered the effect of such a change, and did he desire to introduce that principle in every instance? Did he desire to see the harmony of the school broken up by religious dissension between the boys, and—what was worse—between the teachers? The object of the attack of the hon. Member for Dungarvan was altogether a polemical one. [Mr. MAGUIRE: No, no!] That would be the opinion of every impartial person who had heard or might read it, and the proof that it was so was to be found in the stress which the hon. Gentleman had laid upon the appointment to a subordinate office in the school of a young man who had, he presumed, from conscientious reasons, abandoned the Roman Catholic faith and become a Protestant. He had no authority to speak on behalf of this school. He had no communication from the Governors, but he had heard enough to convince him that this was simply and solely a sectarian and polemical attack, directed to the aggrandizement of the Roman Catholic Church. ["Oh, oh!"] There was no argument in "Oh, oh!" He repeated that that was the case, and it rested with the Government to say whether an institution which was working soundly and well, and training up loyal subjects and good soldiers, should be needlessly interfered with to conciliate the views of parties who had not always been distinguished for loyalty to the Crown.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was no answer to his noble Friend to say that this was a sectarian and polemical attack. The real question was, whether the present state of things was just and desirable. No attack was made on the general character of the institution, of which he could, from personal knowledge, speak, in many respects, in the highest terms, nor on the distinguished General who had the command of the forces in Ireland, whom they all respected. Objection was taken only to the exclusive nature of the principal appointments in the institution. Was it wise or just that an institution intended for the orphans of soldiers who had served their Queen, should be under an exclusive management? The hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), who had been in Ireland and knew the Irish soldiers, had told them what must be the feeling caused by so one-sided an arrangement. And by whom was this institution maintained? Principally by the Vote of this House, and was not a mere charity, but a mark of gratitude for services rendered to the country. Its primary object was not eleemosynary—its primary object was for the public education of orphans of soldiers, and, being for the education of all, it ought to be conducted in a manner in which it could be accepted by all. The hon. Member for Dublin, however, defended the institution on the very ground that it was exclusive. He (Mr. Cardwell) could not admit that argument, and ventured to adhere to the opinion which had been quoted, that not only good feeling towards those for whom the institution was intended, but motives of the highest public policy dictated that the institution should not be exclusive. He sincerely hoped that those who governed the institution, hearing of the opinions expressed on both sides the House, would act on the principle that there should be a just admixture of both religions, and that an institution which was intended for the benefit of all should be so constituted and so conducted as to command the confidence of all classes of the community.

MR. BRADY held that an institution which was supported out of the taxation of the whole kingdom, and was intended for the benefit of the army, without distinction as to religion, should not be allowed to assume an exclusive character. It was most unjust that only one-third of the scholars should be Catholic, while the number of Catholic soldiers was six to one. He, for one, would not allow of supremacy any longer, nor confess himself a less man than another because he professed the religion in which he was born. They were all equal, and he would assert the claim of the Catholic children to all the rights to which they were entitled in this institution. He believed that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies would have a most beneficial effect in Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the Hibernian Military School was not exclusively for the children of Irish soldiers, but was intended for the children of all soldiers in Ireland, and the proportion of Irish Catholic soldiers in Ireland, as compared with Protestant soldiers there, could not be so large as the hon. Member had just mentioned.

MR. BRADY stated that he spoke of the children of Irish parents who enlisted in Ireland, and of these there were four or five Catholics to one Protestant.

MR. O'REILLY said, that the speeches of the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War, and of the right hon. Secretary for the Colonies, were only such as might have been expected from them, and rendered it almost unnecessary for him to make any additional observations on the subject before the House. The difficulty in respect to the Royal Hibernian Military School appeared to arise from the fact that its government was vested in certain Governors, and not in the responsible Government of the country. Nevertheless, that House found the necessary funds to the amount of £12,900. He would suggest a means by which the difficulties that at present existed might be avoided. If the Governors thought that their school would be spoiled by any admixture in the religious element, then let them send the Roman Catholic children to be taught in Roman Catholic schools, and let the Government pay to the managers of those schools the cost of the maintenance and education of these children at the Hibernian School, namely, £27 per head. There would be no difficulty in such schools if it were thought desirable in adding military training to the other branches of education. With regard to the circulation of controversial tracts in the school, it was said that there was no proof of the general circulation of these tracts. That proof, however, it was almost impossible to give, though a number of individual instances might be adduced; and he put it to any hon. Gentleman whether tracts, simply abusing a religion different from that of the writer's, were in any degree necessary for the promotion of religious knowledge or charity among Protestant children. The evidence went to show that such tracts were frequently found in the institution. He would now advert to another subject. When he made a general statement the other evening with respect to the Army Estimates, he said he would draw attention in detail to those particular Votes on which he mentioned the expenditure to be most remarkable, and as the Education Vote was one of them he would briefly allude to it. His previous statement was chiefly founded on a comparison of the cost of the English and French services; and he thought the item of education was one in which a comparison might safely be instituted, and he would, therefore, call attention to the cost of some of the English military schools, not only compared with the French, but with the civil schools in their country. He would take first of all the Royal Military Academy. Any one might suppose that the great expenditure in English military schools was caused by the higher class of treatment which the lads received; but the cost for living was as much in France as it was in England, while the expense of superintendence was in England double its amount elsewhere. There were 250 pupils in the Royal Military Academy, and they cost on the average £161 each. That cost was divided in this way; teaching, £56; administration, £29; namely, £21 10s. for superior and £7 10s. for inferior administration; living and all other expenses, £76. If that was compared with the French Ecole Polytechnique, an institution not inferior, the results would be as follows:—number of pupils 260 (nearly the same as the number in the Royal Military Academy), cost £115 per pupil. The analysis of that expense was, for teaching and administration—for these items were not given separately—£40; living and other expenses, £75; total, £115. In the Royal Military Academy there were 45 teachers, or nearly 1 to every 5 pupils, and that was exclusive of officers. In the Ecole Polytechnique there were 42 teachers, or 1 to every 6 pupils. Then, in the Royal Military Academy there were 48 administrators, or 1 to every 5 pupils, and that arose from a peculiarity of our system, which was that we had not only an entire teaching staff, but also an entire military teaching staff. In foreign schools the two functions were combined, and there was no reason why the captain of a company should not be an efficient teacher. If we compared those items with the cost of civil schools, every one would admit that the expense was excessive. With regard to the Royal Military College for Cadets, the number of pupils was 296, and the cost for teaching was about £55 10s.; for staff £14 10s., and for living, &c., about £70, making a total of £140 per pupil. In the Ecole Impériale Spéciale Militaire, which might be compared with the Cadets College, the number of pupils was 600, the cost of teaching and staff was £34, and of living, &c., £48; total, £82. In the Cadets College there were 42 teachers, or 1 to every 7 pupils; the French found 17 teachers, or 1 to every 35 pupils, enough. To teach 296 pupils we had 8 professors of mathematics, 8 professors of fortifications, 8 professors of military drawing and surveying, 4 French masters, 2 German, 2 who were given as instructors in languages, but it was not said what languages, and 4 professors of landscape drawing. Now, he believed that everyone acquainted with teaching in this country would admit that the number of professors was far more than was necessary. He had nothing more to say upon the subject, but had made these remarks in fulfilment of a pledge which he had given on a former occasion.

COLONEL SYKES said, the cost of military education last year was £172,201, or at the rate of £1 3s. 2½d. per head for the 148,000 men in our army, while in France it was only 7s. 1d. per head.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that the cost of education in the army must be compared with the cost of education in the country generally. Every one knew that just as good education might be got at Vienna, Berlin, or in various parts of Italy, for one-third of what it would cost in this country.

COLONEL NORTH asked for some explanation of the fact that for twenty-Queen's Cadets nominated by the Secretary of State for India, an item of £1,500 was set down, and at the bottom of page 58, it was stated in a note that the Indian Government contributed £3,000 per annum for the Education and Maintenance of twenty Queen's Cadets, nominated by the Secretary of State for India. In the Hospital Vote a sum was set down for pay and lodging allowance for forty-five probationers, to fill up vacancies in the medical department. He wanted to know whether there was any security that those probationers would enter the army medical department?

COLONEL DUNNE inquired whether any alteration would be made in the course set down for the competitive examination for the army? A more absurd system never existed. The French taught everything that the young officers ought to know, we taught them everything but what they ought to know. On the other hand we went to the most ridiculous extreme, and inquired into their acquirements in everything that could not be of the least possible use. The Professors themselves sought for questions merely to puzzle young men, and there was not a single one of those Professors, notwithstanding all their quibbling questions, who would be fit to enter the army.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the expense of the military colleges was, no doubt, high, but the explanation suggested by the hon Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) was, no doubt, the correct one—that the expense of educational establishments of all kinds in this country was much higher than on the Continent. An immense number of Professors were certainly employed in our military colleges, and it would be for the Secretary of State for War to say whether any reduction could be made. As to the question asked by the gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel North) with respect to the twenty Cadets nominated by the Secretary for India, he was not at that time in a position to give an explanation. With respect to the probationers, they would not be compelled to enter the service, but of course it was their intention to do so, otherwise they would not have become probationers.

COLONEL NORTH said, it had been stated that no one could be got to enter the medical department of the army, and, therefore, some security should be had that these persons who came to the army schools for medical education, should join the army medical service. He wished to know why a swimming master had not been appointed, as had been recommended by the Committee.

(3.) £88,345, Surveys.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked why the recommendations of the Committee on the Cadastral Survey, in 1862, were not carried out. He wished to urge on the Government the propriety of completing the survey on the 25-inch scale, such as had been adopted by most of the principal countries in Europe. A Government map on such a scale, accessible to every one, would be of immense advantage in an infinite number of cases, particularly in those connected with the sale and transfer of land, drainage, questions arising under the Parochial Assessment Acts, &c. It was shown before the Committee which investigated this subject that the larger the sum voted at the outset the cheaper the map would be in the end, as delays and difficulties inseparable from endless changes of plan would thereby be obviated.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN suggested that the attention of the Director of the Cadastral Survey should be directed in the first instance to the mineral districts of the country.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE considered that the department should first direct its attention to the survey of the populous districts, and where the country was greatly subdivided. He understood that maps of portions of Kent and the South Coast were in a very forward state, and nearly fit for publication. He suggested that these should be brought out at once, as the large sale they would be sure to command would greatly stimulate the progress of the rest of the survey. It was idle to go on publishing maps of distant and unimportant portions of the country to the neglect of fields so much more productive and inviting.

Mr. WYLD said, that the Government survey was being executed in the most expensive and costly manner. He believed that under proper management a great deal more work might have been executed for the £100,000 which had been for several years voted for the purpose. Scotland had great cause of complaint, because, although she contributed her share towards the Vote for the Ordnance Survey, she had suffered great neglect at the hands of the Director General of the Survey. Next Session he proposed, when this Vote was again before the House, to enter upon an analysis of the work, and to show how for the same expenditure a greater result might have been obtained.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that the spirit of the recommendation of the Committee had been carried out. The sum of £67,000 voted last year for the survey had been increased this year to £75,000. The Government were assailed from two opposite quarters on this matter, for while some hon. Members advised a diminution of the expenditure, others thought a largely increased expenditure would be beneficial. The Committee which sat for two years recommended that a sum of £90,000 should be devoted annually to complete the survey of Great Britain, and the late Sir George Lewis announced that this recommendation would be adopted by the Government and carried into effect. The history of the Ordnance Survey showed that the sums voted by Parliament had fluctuated to a degree that had paralyzed the survey, and caused a waste of £40,000. At first the survey was not conducted according to one uniform system of triangulation, and when the results were put together, enormous discrepancies were observable. It was then resolved that there should be one uniform system of survey for the whole of the kingdom. A few years ago, however, it was determined to survey Ireland on the six-inch scale, and also some of the Northern counties. The whole survey was then suspended and referred to a Committee which reported in favour of the one-inch scale. The matter was then referred to a Royal Commission, which recommended the 25-inch survey. The House, on the Motion of Sir Denham Norreys, affirmed the principle of the 25-inch survey, but next year the hon. Member for St. Andrew's (Mr. E. Ellice) carried a Motion condemning the principle. By this means the operations of the department were paralyzed, and a loss of from £35,000 to £40,000 was sustained. Not less than fourteen blue-books had been published on this subject. It had been examined by a Royal Commission and three Committees. The last Committee, of which he was a member, recommended that a fixed annual sum should be voted, and that a 25-inch survey should be carried on because it contained within itself the elements of all the other surveys, and might be reduced to any other scale. The invention of photography and zincography had saved the country many thousands of pounds. Maps were formerly reduced by the slow process of the pentagraph; but now a map was placed upon a board in a room, and, by means of photography, was reduced in ten minutes to any scale that might be desired, and with perfect accuracy. He believed that the Survey Department was exceedingly well managed. The Committee went down to Southampton, investigated the means and appliances of the office, and were satisfied that the department was well organized. The triangulation over the whole of Great Britain was now completed. Certain portions of the kingdom, where works had been recommended by the Defence Commission, had been already surveyed on the 25-inch scale, and when the rest of the kingdom had been surveyed these portions would be brought in without additional survey to make a general map. It had been said by the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) that the one-inch map should be completed before proceeding further with the 25-inch, but hon. Gentlemen should recollect that the greater contained the less. With respect to the progress of the Ordnance Survey, he could state that all England had been surveyed upon the one-inch scale, and, with the exception of parts of Northumberland and Cumberland, the maps had been published. The hon. Member for Bodmin would recollect that the Committee recommended that the Highlands of Scotland should not be surveyed upon the larger scale. Upon the whole, he thought it would be found the survey had proceeded with tolerable rapidity.

MR. F. S. POWELL observed, that in these discussions there always appeared to exist a confusion between surveys and maps. It was supposed that because a survey was on a certain scale, therefore the map must be on the same scale; but, in truth, if the survey was made, the question as to the scale upon which the map should be made was subordinate and should be decided independently. The great question was when would the survey be completed; and, therefore, he hoped the Committee would vote sums sufficient to allow of the survey being pressed with vigour and efficiency. When completed it would be of the utmost value. We were very far behind other countries in this matter, both as to the progress of the survey and the quality of the maps.

MR. AYRTON said, that if this Committee were as well inclined to economy as a former Committee had been, he should ask them to put an end to the publication of the series of maps upon a 25-inch scale for the whole country. Those maps had been invested with a degree of mystery by being styled cadastral surveys—which they really were not, because a cadastral survey would give an account of all the landed property of the country, the acreage and tenure of the land. If this minute style of mapping was to be truly and honestly carried out it could not be done for £1,400,000, but would cost nearer double that amount; and, after all, would be badly done, and would be of little value to anybody but the proprietors of landed estates. At present the Survey Department confined itself to maps upon the 1-inch scale, which were found to be very inaccurate. If that was the case with a 1-inch scale what would it be with maps upon a 25-inch scale. He believed that, for all practical purposes, the House was sanctioning a great and useless expense, because if gentlemen wanted their estates surveyed they should do it in their own way, and pay for the labour themselves.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the extension of the survey was conducted mainly upon the principle advocated by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir William Jolliffe); the chief towns of the kingdom had been completed to a great extent; and the maps sold to the amount of £12,000 a year, which very much more than compensated for the cost of publication. The suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) was, no doubt, worthy of consideration. Those parts of the country where fortifications already existed, or were about to be erected, required the earliest attention, and the utmost accuracy; but he promised his hon. Friend that attention would be paid to his suggestions in reference to the mining districts, if it could be done without adding very much to the cost. As to the observations of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), he could only say that the subject of the survey was one of a scientific nature, and the House had several times agreed to treat it as such, and to refer it to those who could enter upon it better than the House. The House last year accepted the recommendations of the Select Committee, on the suggestion of the late Sir George Cornwall Lewis, as it seemed to that right hon. Baronet that it would be a waste of money to be continually changing the scale of survey. If the country were to be surveyed at all, the whole of the country should be surveyed; and then no one could object to the publication of the maps, because as the publication was equally advantageous to individuals as it was to the public, the sale would return some compensation for the outlay.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he concurred with the noble Lord who presided over the Survey Committee (Viscount Bury) that the early surveys were inaccurate, though they referred to some of the most important districts of the country. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) seemed to be carried away with strange notions as to the use of those maps. He seemed to think that they were only intended to point out the boundaries of gentlemen's estates. The parish authorities, however, wanted the correct boundaries; so did the Tithe Commutation Commissioners. All parties, in fact, required to have accurate maps with the view to the proper conveyance of land. He was anxious to see accurate maps, and he did not care about the expense of obtaining them.

MR. F. S. POWELL thought that the Committee were entitled to know what was the time at which the ordnance and geological surveys would be completed. They had been voting, year after year, large sums of money, and they were now entitled to know when they would obtain the fruit of their labours.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was calculated that £90,000 a year would be required for twenty years for the Ordnance Survey. The Geological Survey was not connected with the Ordnance Survey, and he was unable to answer in respect to it.

(4.) £123,103, Miscellaneous Services
agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £223,834, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of the Administration of the Army, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, inclusive."

MR. O'REILLY said, that the cost of the administration of the army had been frequently referred to as being the department of our public expenditure where a good deal of judicious paring could be exercised with advantage. The noble Lord who represented the Army Department had, on a previous occasion, when the subject was under discussion, made some little confusion between the general Staff and the administration of the army. The hon. and gallant Member for Queen's County (Colonel Dunne) had also expressed a hope that he would not press for any diminution of the general Staff of the army. But, in fact, that department was entirely different from the administration. In administration the French were certainly not inferior to ourselves. Our head department consisted of a Secretary of State and a Commander-in-Chief, the expense being £9,442, while the French managed with one Minister, to whom they, however, paid more, his salary being £5,200. The French officials—directeurs, chefs, et commis—equivalent to our officials from secretaries to clerks inclusive—were for the double-sized army only 501, whose salaries were £58,964, against 627 persons in our own departments, with £177,207 of salaries. The office-keepers and servants were in both the English departments 106 in number, at a cost of £4,999; the French were about the same, with £5,462 of salaries. The total cost of the English administration, deducting the Quartermaster General's department, was £1 7s. per man, while the French total, leaving out the Dépôt de la Guerre, which was equivalent to our Surveys and Topographical Department, was about 4s. 6d. per man. It was said that this difference arose from the different rate of pay and of salaries in the two countries. But this could not be, inasmuch as the average English salary was somewhat more than double that of the French, while the cost per man was eleven times as great. It had been said that what Members should do was, not to make comparisons between the cost of the two armies, but to point out how reductions could be effected. But it was idle to expect that any Member could point out, for example, which of the 627 secretaries or clerks could be dispensed with. He should not conclude with any Motion, but in another year he thought that if the Government did not diminish the cost of army administration the House ought to enforce it upon them.

COLONEL SYKES said, the French divided their administration into personnel and matériel, and his estimate did not differ substantially from that just given, for he made it 5s. 5d. per man, while in the English army it was £1 8s. 8d. per man.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked for an explanation of the extraordinary charge of £978 for forage for the Commander-in-Chief.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, it was in the civil administration of the army that reductions must take place, and pointed out that there was an increase of clerks simultaneously with a reduction of the army.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the forage allowance to the Commander-in-Chief was not a new charge; it was only that which the regulations sanctioned for a Field Marshal, and he did not think that the Committee should grudge this charge. As to the civil branches of the army, the Secretary for War was inquiring into this subject, with a view, if possible, to make reductions. He did not think it was quite fair to compare this with the corresponding French Vote, for a great part of the services which were performed in the War Department and in the Commander-in-Chief's department in this country were performed in France, as he understood, by the Intendance and the Etat Major, neither of which came into the corresponding French Vote.

MR. O'REILLY said, he had made the requisite allowance for this in his calculation.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, according to an estimate made in the War Office, the expenses of that office, of the Commander-in-Chief's office, and the Staff did not compare nearly so unfavourably as the hon. Member had stated with the expenses of the French War Office, the Intendance and the Etat Major. From this estimate it appeared that the relative cost of the two administrations maintained the same proportion as that of other branches of the service, the English costing about double that of the French.

MR. WYLD called attention to the fact that the Topographical Department had recently published a plan of the fortifications of Fredericia, which gave the Germans information which they did not before possess. During the Italian war a somewhat similar incident took place. The Austrian Government had published some time previously a large map of the Austrian empire. When the war broke out they refused to supply it, and prohibited its sale. But our Topographical Department reproduced this map, and the French Government, who could not obtain it elsewhere, actually supplied themselves with copies thus taken.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the functions of the Topographical Department were to collect and preserve authentic maps of every part of the world respecting which it was for the interests of the service that we should have information. It was impossible that the plan of Fredericia, to which the hon. Member had alluded, could have been of any assistance to the Germans. In the first place, the original map had been obtained from the British Museum, where it was open for anybody's inspection; and, in the next place, it was by no means an accurate plan, having been published before 1848, since which time he believed that new fortifications had been erected. The map in question was published simply for the purpose of rendering more intelligible the despatches of our Ministers which might be received during the progress of the war. It was impossible that its publication could give any information to either army which they were not in possession of before. At the same time, he quite agreed that great care should be taken as to the publication of maps under such circumstances.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, no proper explanation had been given of the item of £973, the reduction of the allowance for forage to the Commander-in-Chief. He would move the reduction of that item by the sum of £473, and the reduction of the allowance for forage to the Adjutant General by the sum of £244.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Item of £973, for Allowance for Forage to the Field Marshal, Commanding-in-Chief, be reduced by the sum of £473,"—(Mr. Williams,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The Marquess of Hartington

The following Votes were also agreed to:—

(6.) £26,020, Rewards for Military Service.

(7.) £75,400, Pay of General Officers.

(8.) £449,471, Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers.

(9.) £162,986, Widows' Pensions and Compassionate Allowances.

(10.) £29,663, Pensions and Allowances to Wounded Officers.

COLONEL DUNNE asked for some explanation respecting the mode of pensioning; and called attention to the case of the barrack-masters, many of whom were of an age that almost unfitted them for the performance of their duty. He had also to call attention to the case of distinguished cavalry officers placed on half-pay without the Commander-in-Chief being able to give them active employment. It was most objectionable to place officers after long service in India on half-pay on their return. He was sure the House would readily vote the money to keep those officers in active service.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the practice referred to had always existed; and, as far as he knew, there was no intention on the part of the Government to alter it.

(11.) £33,260, In-Pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals.

(14.) £31,213, Non-Effective Services, Disembodied Militia.

PARTNERSHIP LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 68.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (A Limited Partnership may be formed).

Amendment again proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "and all such partnerships shall be distinguished by the addition of the word 'registered' to the name of the firm, in all its dealings and transactions."—(Mr. Thomas Baring.)

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, the proposition of the hon. Gentleman was fully discussed on a former evening, and he would not repeat the arguments which were then used against it. However, he might observe that it would be just as reasonable for the hon. Gentleman to ask that every loan should be registered as to ask that loans under this Bill should be registered. The Amendment would be a serious detriment to the measure, and he hoped the House would not adopt it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY supported the Amendment. He should like to have some proof of the injury likely to be done by the insertion of the word. The word "limited," as at present applied to various undertakings, was not detrimental to the investment of capital therein. Surely when a partnership changed its character, and came under the operation of the Bill, the public were entitled to be acquainted of the fact.

MR. GOSCHEN, as a friend of the Bill, would be glad to see a provision introduced to compel the announcement in the Gazette of an alteration in the constitution of a firm. That, he thought, would answer the purpose required.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS supported the principle of giving the most complete publicity to the circumstances of these partnerships.

MR. BRIGHT protested against the attempt to combine in the present Bill objects not compatible with its provisions. If such objects were desired, they might be made the subject of a special Bill, but ought not to be included in this. Hon. Gentlemen might depend upon it that they were taking care over much. People concerned with firms under the Bill were shrewd enough to take care of their own interests, if they only had perfect liberty to act. He could not help thinking that a great deal of the zeal shown by the hon. Baronet was opposed to the Bill itself. Years ago he was opposed to the principle of joint-stock liability, and predicted that disasters would result from it. But the change had been most successful. Freedom of commerce had been attended with enormous advantages here, as it had in every country where it had been adopted. He (Mr. Bright) was satisfied that, if the Bill were passed without any of the endless irritating restrictions sought to be put on its free working, we should in a few years be as content with the working of the measure as we were with the working of that of limited liability.

MR. LOCKE said no reason why, if these partnerships were to be registered, they should not say so plainly to all the world.

MR. T. BARING said, that if the Law Officers of the Crown were content to allow the clause to be passed in its present shape he would offer no further opposition to it.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 43: Majority 15.

Clause 4 (Any person lending money to General Partners on certain Terms to be a Limited Partner).

MR. BUCHANAN moved the omission of the words "or contract to lend." His objection to the proposal for contracting to lend was, that all those who had advocated the measure did so on the ground that it would chiefly be of use in enabling young men to come forward in business, by their friends advancing them a loan without incurring the risk of a partnership. No doubt the advance of money to such young men was of the utmost importance, but it was quite a different thing to "contract to lend" and to actually advance money.

Amendment proposed, in line 40, to leave out the words "or contract to lend."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

MR. SCHOLEFIELD opposed the Amendment. He had never put the case which his hon. Friend had just put to the Committee. The Committee would surely not compel a limited partner to pay into a concern which did not want the money. The clause only carried out the principle of a company whose shares were not paid up in full.

MR. T. BARING remarked that in France and the United States the money must be actually paid to the firm. Supposing the person contracting to lend money should fail, what claim would the limited partnership have on the estate.

Question put, "That those words stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 46: Majority 7.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, after the decisions of the Committee he thought it would be useless to proceed further with the Bill. He would, therefore, move "that the Chairman leave the Chair."

Mr. J. O. EWART hoped the hon. Gentleman would not abandon the measure, as notwithstanding the alterations that had been made there was much good in it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY thought the principle involved in the measure was of far too great importance to be left in the hands of a private Member, and was of opinion that if it was to be dealt with at all it should be dealt with by the Government.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER contended that the hon. Member for Birmingham had adopted the right course in withdrawing the Bill, and trusted the Government would bear in mind the fact that the commercial community would expect from them the introduction, with as little delay as possible, of a measure embodying the principle involved in the present proposal.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, that his hon. Friend had, he thought, done wisely in withdrawing the Bill. As far as he could see, the Government appeared to have no decided opinion on the matter, inasmuch as some of its members had voted one way and some another in the divisions which had just taken place.

Mr. T. BARING urged the expediency of having a Bill dealing with the law of partnership, if introduced at all, brought in on the authority of the Government, and under the auspices of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON thought his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had a fair right to expect that his Bill would have received the support of the House, seeing that a similar measure had passed through the House, after having been referred to a Select Committee last Session. If exception were to be taken, as seemed to be the case, to every word in every clause, it would be impossible even for the Government to carry through such a measure. The Government, he might add, had several Sessions ago brought forward a proposal embodying the principle of enabling persons to lend money to prosecute a business without making themselves general partners, but the proposal had not met with much favour. He could only say, in conclusion, that he regretted his hon. Friend had been so discouraged as to be induced to give up the Bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN, as a Member of the Select Committee to which reference had been made, wished to observe that they refused to hear any evidence. Were they a tribunal, then, he would ask, which ought to be looked to to inform the public as to the merits of the question?

Mr. CRAUFURD trusted the hon. Member for Birmingham would reconsider his determination to abandon the Bill. Even with the Amendments which had been introduced into it, there still remained in it, he thought, no small amount of good.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to make a similar appeal to his hon. Friend, who, he was sure, was of too high a character to be influenced in the matter by mere feeling. If he were to take further time to consider the course which he should pursue, it was quite possible he might find in the Bill provisions still untouched which would render it worth his while to persevere with it. If, however, he should withdraw it, he had no doubt the Government would be quite ready to take into consideration the question, whether it was possible to frame a measure on the subject; while, at the same time, it was not, in his opinion, desirable to lay it down as a rule that all questions would be more advantageously dealt with by the Government than by a private Member.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD said that, in compliance with the suggestions which had just been made to him, he should withdraw the Motion that the Chairman leave the Chair, and simply move that he report Progress, with the view of proceeding with the Bill after the Whitsuntide recess.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER remarked that in the divisions which had just taken place the President of the Board of Trade had voted one way and the Attorney General another.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that by the vote which he gave he did not intend to take a step which would be prejudicial to the Bill, and he had heard with great regret his hon. Friend's announcement that he should abandon the measure. He was entirely favourable to the principle of the Bill, and had only voted to-night as he had voted last year. He thought that if a new class of partnerships were introduced and required to be registered, they ought to go into the world avowedly such as they were.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday, 19th May.

PATENT OFFICE LIBRARY

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. DILLWYN, in moving the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire as to the most suitable arrangements to be made respecting the Patent Office Library and Museum, said, that he had communicated with the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) the Chairman of the Patent Law Commission, who had informed him that he saw no objection to the appointment of this Committee before the Report of that Commission had been presented.

MR. COWPER thought that it would be both inconvenient and disrespectful to the Patent Law Commission that this Committee should be appointed before their Report, which might shortly be expected, was received. He, therefore, could not assent to the Motion.

MR. GREGORY wished to hear further particulars from the Government, for the House ought to have more precise knowledge before deciding on the subject. He thought it would be well to wait for the Report of the Commission.

MR. AYRTON said, that as the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn had stated that this Committee would not interfere with the proceedings of the Commission, the fact that that Commission had not yet reported was no reason for delaying its appointment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that although the appointment of this Committee might not interfere with the proceedings of the Patent Law Commission, yet when that Commission reported there would be a great many subjects connected with patents which must necessarily be considered, and it would be convenient to consider them all together. It would, therefore, be better to postpone the appointment of this Committee.

Motion made, and Question put,

SENTENCES OF DEATH BILL (No. 58.)

SECOND READING.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said: My Lords, since this Bill was read the first time, the House of Commons have, I understand, agreed to an Address to Her Majesty for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the provisions and operations of the law under which sentences of death are passed, and into the manner in which those sentences have been executed of late years; and likewise to report whether it is desirable to make any alterations therein. I think, perhaps, that the House of Commons might have expressed themselves somewhat more clearly; but I apprehend there is no doubt they deem it desirable that an inquiry should be made by a Royal Commission into these three points:—1. Whether it is expedient to continue the punishment of death; 2. Whether, if continued, it is expedient that that punishment should be applied to the same crimes as those to which it is now applied; and 3. To what authority should be committed the power of deciding ultimately, after sentence of death has been passed, whether it should be carried into execution or should be commuted? Now, that proceeding, on the part of the House of Commons, necessarily raises this question—Is it expedient that Parliament should wait until the Commission has presented its Report and made its recommendations? If Parliament should do that, I think it might have to wait a very considerable time. This is one of those matters which will, in all likelihood, be discussed and examined at the greatest length; and I cannot suppose that in less than a year or two any Parliamentary proceedings could take place in consequence of the recommendations of the Commission. Another question is, Shall we proceed with this Bill, or shall some other and better measure be presented to your Lordships for your consideration? There can be no doubt that the subject of the Bill is one of the very greatest importance, and one which will not bear any great delay. There is beyond question a growing want of confidence in the decisions arrived at by the Secretary of State with respect to the carrying into effect or commuting sentences of death. This arises, I apprehend, not from any disrespect for the Gentleman who performs the duty of Secretary of State, but because his decisions are taken on his sole responsibility. I must say it is too great a weight to throw upon any man to subject him to the necessity of deciding on his sole responsibility whether another man shall live or die. I think it most expedient to surround the Secretary of State with every security we can which is calculated to inspire confidence in his decisions, and to arm those decisions with such authority as shall make them generally acceptable to the public. That is the object I had in view in presenting this Bill to your Lordships. It is no new invention of mine. I have endeavoured to reproduce and extend an ancient practice which prevailed within my memory in respect to the sentences of death passed in the City of London by the Recorder. My Lords, the thing I dread the most is, that from untoward circumstances there should arise in this country such a want of confidence in the decisions taken and the proceedings adopted in regard to sentences of death as would impair the law as it now stands, inflicting this punishment for certain offences. I believe the maintenance of that law to be of the most essential importance to the best interests of the community; and the only danger I see is from a want of confidence, such as I have described, in its administration. I believe that at the present moment the strongest feeling excited in this country in regard to this matter arises, not on account of an execution of a criminal taking place when it is justly merited, but when through an accident or some miscarriage of justice a great criminal escapes the punishment due to his offences. It is impossible to doubt that in the case of Townley a universal feeling existed that the ends of justice were defeated. My Lords, I think the result of this Commission will be that there will be a decided expression of opinion on its part that the punishment of death must be retained; and I believe it will also offer suggestions with the view of giving some support and assistance to the Secretary of State in these cases. The first thing suggested probably will be that the Secretary of State should have the constant advantage of the advice of the noble and learned Lord who may sit on the Woolsack. It may, however, happen that the Lord Chancellor may not be conversant with criminal law, but may have passed his professional career in the Courts of Equity. It would be desirable, therefore, that the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench should be added to the advisers of the Secretary of State. But the act to be done being the act, not of an individual, but of the Government, I cannot see how it would be possible not to make the First Minister of the Crown, the First Lord of the Treasury, one of the persons who should be present at these consultations. The consultative body would become, in fact, a Committee of the Privy Council; and how, again, would it be possible to exclude from the discussion in such a Committee the person who is President of the Council? These four persons, in addition to the Secretary of State, should be summoned for the consideration of these cases. But, besides these five, the remainder of Her Majesty's Cabinet would also be present, according to the plan I am proposing to your Lordships. I think it is better, if we can, to go back to past times and adopt that which has been sanctioned by experience, and which once existed, not only without any objection on the part of the public, but with their concurrence and confidence. I must likewise observe that I think it a very great advantage of the practice suggested by the Bill now before your Lordships, that the Sovereign would, under occasional circumstances, sit and act in these cases. I believe that the presence of the Sovereign gives that gravity and solemnity which befits the consultation of those who have to decide on the life of a man. It was so formerly, and I am satisfied it would be so again, and that we should guard the law as it exists, and maintain it most successfully by affording the Sovereign an opportunity of being present when these decisions are taken. I hope your Lordships will consider the expediency of proceeding with immediate legislation on this matter, dealing with this Bill as you deem best, agreeing to commit it if you think fit; or —what I should undoubtedly prefer—proposing some other and better measure, such as may occur to any other noble Lord, for the purpose of meeting that which is a great danger, the want of confidence in the administration of justice.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl has, I think, stated correctly what has been done by the House of Commons in reference to this matter. The point, however, as he says, which we have to consider is whether, when a Commission appointed at the request of the other House is sitting on this subject, the question ought not to be postponed; or whether we should adopt the present Bill or send it to a Committee; or lastly, whether some other measure more fully answering the same object should be introduced. I must say that my own impression is strongly in favour of the first alternative suggested by the noble Earl. While I admit that the question ought not to be very long delayed, on the other hand I think it is not at all desirable that we should proceed hastily in a matter of this kind. It appears to me, I confess, that there would be something anomalous as well as inconvenient in our attempting to legislate at the very outset of the labours of the Commission, and I hardly think that noble and learned Members of this House themselves would like to run the risk incident to such a course. I think your Lordships and the public are indebted to the noble Earl for the attention he has paid to this subject, and for the pains he has taken in drawing up the Bill; but, at the same time, it appears to me that his Bill is open to grave objections. The first clause is objectionable for a plain and simple reason. I have always understood that the infliction of the punishment of death is the act of the law, and it is placing the Secretary of State in a false and obnoxious position to say that the execution of the sentence of death is his act and not the act of the law. An equally strong objection may be urged against the next clause, as to receiving the report of the Judge, and summoning certain Members of the Privy Council, indicated by the noble Earl, to assist the Secretary of State in coming to a decision whether the sentence shall be carried out or not. It occurs to me (though I do not think it ought to be an objection in a matter of this importance) that there would be a great practical difficulty in assembling at all times of the year, particularly during the long vacation, five Members of the Privy Council, to consider whether a sentence of death should be carried out or not. But I would ask the noble Earl whether the decision of those five Members of the Privy Council, supposing it to confirm the sentence of death, is to be regarded as final? The pressure always comes at the last moment, and if the decision of the Privy Councillors is to be final, what answer must be given to those parties who, interested in a person under sentence of death, may come forward after the final decision has been taken with plausible allegations that new and important evidence had been discovered? It is quite impossible, if the present Bill should pass, that the Secretary of State should take upon himself the responsibility of reversing a decision come to just before by a Committee of the Privy Council; and yet circumstances may be laid before him warranting further inquiry. It would then be necessary for him to re-assemble the Committee; but that would be a matter of difficulty, and would occupy some time. Again, one of the strongest objections to the existing state of things is that the Secretary of State has no power of ordering a new trial or any judicial inquiry into the facts of a case; and I apprehend it is the absence of that power which makes his decision to a certain degree unpopular and unsatisfactory. Your Lordships will observe that the present Bill gives no power whatever to the Committee of Privy Council to institute such an inquiry, or to order a new trial, or to do anything more than can now be done by the Secretary of State with the view of arriving at a satisfactory result. As for the presence of Her Majesty, no doubt it would give a certain amount of solemnity to the proceedings of the Committee of Privy Council, and it may be said to be in conformity with precedent; but I rather think it would be contrary to constitutional practice that the Sovereign should preside at any Council where deliberation or discussion takes place. With respect to the Recorder of London, I believe he does not sit as judge in any case of murder at all, and I can see no reason why he should be summoned. No doubt some of the objections I have just stated might be met in Committee on the Bill; but the first reason I gave—that a Commission is about to be appointed at the request of the other House to consider the whole subject of capital punishments, and that such Commission will doubtless feel it to be its duty to examine the proposition of the noble Earl, will, I trust, satisfy your Lordships that this measure should not be proceeded with further. It is much desired by the Government that they should be allowed to recommend the noble Earl himself as one of the Commissioners; but whether or not the noble Earl may consent to act, I am persuaded that his proposal will receive all the attention it so well deserves. The fact that they entirely approve the suggestion of the House of Commons for the appointment of a Commission will prevent the Government undertaking the responsibility of introducing a Bill until they have the great advantage of being guided by the inquiries and recommendations of the Commissioners, and I trust the noble Earl, satisfied with an expression of his opinion, will not press the present measure further.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I am very glad that the President of the Council, on behalf of the Government, has asked the noble Earl not to proceed further with this Bill, which appears to me, after mature consideration, to be open to objections far stronger than those which can be urged against the existing law which it is designed to alter. The noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) has recommended this Bill on the ground that it is in accordance with the precedent afforded by the former practice of submitting to the King in Council the Recorder's Report of capital convictions in London. It is my lively recollection of the proceedings of the Privy Council in those cases which induces me most sincerely to deprecate the passing of this measure. Before Her Majesty came to the throne it was the practice that all capital convictions which took place at the Central Criminal Court were reported to the King in Council by the Recorder of London, and then it was decided in the Council whether the sentences should be carried into effect or not. It was my duty, during the last two years of that practice, as a Member of the Government of Lord Melbourne, to attend the Council when such cases were brought before it, and I have a most lively recollection of the utterly unsatisfactory character of the proceedings on those occasions. What I then saw convinced me that it would be totally impossible for five Members of the Privy Council, with the Chief Justice and the Recorder of London, sitting in council together, hearing evidence read before them, and then letters and memorials bearing on a remission of punishment, with documents sent from the Home Office, to form a sound judgment as to whether a certain sentence should be carried out or not. If there is to be an appeal in criminal cases at all, it ought to be to a tribunal very differently constituted; but I own I think it extremely doubtful whether any such appeal is necessary. In my opinion the fault lies, not in the law as it stands, but in the manner in which it has been administered for a considerable number of years. A practice has grown up at the Home Office—not under the right hon. Gentleman who at present presides over that Department—he found it in existence—by which the Secretary of State is called upon to listen to those persons who question the propriety of verdicts given by juries in capital cases. I utterly deny the propriety of the Secretary of State so sitting in judgment upon the verdicts of juries. How can he, or any Council, upon hearing evidence read—without seeing the witnesses, without having an opportunity of observing their demeanour, without having the immense advantage which those who were personally present at the trial possess over those who merely hear the result of it—form a competent judgment as to the correctness of a verdict? I have, therefore, always held that the practice of the Secretary of State, considering the propriety of verdicts, was altogether a wrong one. If the Judge and jury are satisfied, my opinion is that the Secretary of State is bound to accept the verdict; and consequently, if I had ever had the honour of holding the high office of Home Secretary, I should positively have declined going into the evidence with a view of forming an opinion whether the verdict was right or not. There is only one case in which that rule ought to be departed from—namely, when circumstances have come to light after the trial and in consequence of the trial, which were not before the Judge and jury, which may throw suspicion on some of the evidence on which the person had been convicted, or which may explain away things that had led the jury to believe in his guilt. When such circumstances come to light afterwards it is fitting they should be investigated: but in applying that rule the utmost caution is necessary, for it never would do if persons accused of crime were at liberty to hold back material evidence at the time of trial, when their witnesses would be liable to be cross-examined and to have all their statements thoroughly sifted, in order to bring it forward later, when it could not be tested in the same manner. It therefore seems to me that only circumstances which have arisen since the trial, or which it was shown to have been impossible to bring forward while the trial was proceeding, should be allowed to be considered by the Secretary of State. Except in those special and exceptional cases, the duty of the Secretary of State is not to sit in judgment upon the verdict of the jury, but to consider whether, that verdict being right, there are circumstances to justify the extension of the mercy of the Crown to the criminal. That, and that only, is his duty. Of late years we have had cases, such as those of poisoning, where medical men came forward one after another to question the evidence taken at the trial, and to press their several views, in order to induce the Secretary of State to believe that the Judge and jury were entirely in the wrong. I protest against that practice as being in the highest degree improper. It is the duty of the Secretary of State only to consider whether or not there are circumstances which justify the mercy of the Crown being extended to the criminal, and it is not one from which he ought to shrink, especially while the law remains in what my noble Friend the President of the Council rightly called its proper state—namely, that unless the Crown interferes justice takes its course, without any direction from the Secretary of State or the Government. Formerly when there was a great variety of capital crimes, the Secretary of State had a very difficult and painful duty to perform in deciding when the penalty should be remitted. Now, however, murder is almost the only crime for which capital punishment is actually inflicted, although there are two or three other crimes to which the penalty of death attaches; and I believe that when Parliament thus restricted the application of that punishment, it was with the intention that in all cases of deliberate murder the law should take its course, unless there were some very strong and special grounds why it should be arrested. If it is admitted that in cases of convictions for murder the Secretary of State should not re-consider the verdict of the jury, but should inquire only whether there are special and exceptional reasons for extending the clemency of the Crown, then I say there is nothing in that duty which one man cannot perfectly execute. Nay, I go further. I am fully persuaded that the responsibility will be more effectual and complete if, as now, it rests on the Secretary of State than if it were borne by the whole Committee of Council. I altogether object to the principle of frittering away responsibility by distributing it over too large a body. I think the law is quite right as it stands, and that the only alteration required is in the manner in which it is carried out.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he differed from the noble Earl (Earl Grey) that the main difficulty of the present system did not arise from the state of the law, but from the manner in which it was exercised; and especially he differed from him in the error he had pointed out that the Secretary of State constituted himself a sort of court of appeal to try cases over again. His opinion was that the present amount of dissatisfaction which existed in the public mind was attributable, in a great degree, to the present state of the law, and that it would not be remedied until the state of the law was altered. He shared the conclusion of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, that the present state of the law, which established no distinction between the different shades and degrees of murder—which recognized no distinction whatever, except the broad distinction between homicide and murder—was contrary to the common sense and conscience of the people, and that the dissatisfaction had mainly arisen from the Secretary of State being constituted a court of appeal. His opinion was, that of the cases which had occurred lately in which public feeling and the conscience of the people had been more or less violated in respect to the escape of criminals, there were only a few in which the decision of the Secretary of State had any relation to the question of evidence. The only case which he could recollect in which it could be supposed that that decision had reference to the evidence was in the celebrated case of Jessie Maclachlan.

EARL GREY: And Smethurst.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Yes, Smethurst was a recent case. Now, the case of Jessie Maclachlan had not reference so much to her guilt, but as to whether another person who had not been tried was not more guilty than she was—whether he was not the primary agent in the crime and she the secondary one. His noble Friend had mentioned the Smethurst case. Now, in that instance, the decision of the Secretary of State was, no doubt, in part influenced by the idea that the evidence was deficient. But in nine cases out of ten the pressure that was brought upon the Secretary of State was not brought upon him to review the evidence with regard to the guilt or innocence of the criminal, but as to the degree of heinousness of the crime, and that was so in the last case—that of Hall. In that case there was clearly premeditation; but there were also circumstances of provocation which, to some extent, palliated the crime. Then there were other questions, as for instance insanity; and the noble Earl who had introduced the Bill had referred to Townley's case with undoubtedly a great deal of justice. There the criminal escaped justice owing to the defective nature of the clause in the Act, which was not noticed when the Act was passed, and which was not known to exist till it was discovered by the ingenuity of the attorney for the prisoner. So far that defect had been remedied by the passing of an Act which removed the difficulty which arose in that particular case. He had not risen to discuss the principle of the Bill then before the House, but to express an opinion which he strongly entertained, that the main fault had not been in the administration of the law, but in the state of the law, and that unless Parliament proceeded to an alteration of the law, somewhat in the manner that was suggested on a former occasion by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, capital punishment would not survive many years in this country.

LORD REDESDALE said, he could not allow what the noble Duke had said to pass without some observation. He believed it was very far from being the general opinion that it would be desirable to attempt to distinguish between different degrees of criminality, such as would lead to the adoption of the system which prevailed in France. It was hardly possible to read the verdicts found by French juries "with extenuating circumstances" without seeing that the introduction of that system into England, leaving that discretion to the juries, would lead to the greatest dissatisfaction.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said that, in deference to the feeling which their Lordships had expressed, he should ask leave to withdraw the Bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, May 10, 1864.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Edward William Watkin, esquire, for Stockport.

THE WAR IN ASHANTEE. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that war has been commenced with Ashantee; whether precautions have been taken to meet the drain of life which must ensue in so deadly a campaign; and whether a largely increasing expenditure may be looked for in consequence in the Gold Coast Colony?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, it would probably be in the knowledge of the House that in the course of last year a war commenced between the King of Ashantee and a friendly tribe adjoining our settlements on the Gold Coast, arising out of an unprovoked incursion of the Ashantees into that country, attended with great ravages and loss of life and property. The operations which were now going on arose out of a continuance of the hostilities of last year, or rather out of a probability of the renewal of those hostilities, unless vigorous measures were taken to repress them. Reinforcements had been sent out to the Governor, and every precaution had been taken to supply him with all necessaries calculated to ensure the health and safety of troops in that country. The last Report from the Governor announced that the troops were in good health and spirits. No doubt these operations were attended with some danger and expense, but the object of them was to prevent the recurrence of these outbreaks in future years.

ARMY—OFFICERS' ALLOWANCES AT BERMUDA.—QUESTION.

MR. CLAY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether any information has been received respecting the excessive demand for, and consequent high price of, provisions and accommodation at Bermuda; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government intend to make a Colonial allowance for Officers on duty in that island?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the Colonial allowances were not made by the Government, but in almost all cases by the Colonies themselves out of the Colonial funds. In this case the Government had received an application from officers in command of troops at Bermuda for increased allowances in consequence of the high rates of provisions. From a comparison of the contract rate of provisions at this station and elsewhere in the West Indies and at home, it did not appear that the rate by any means was excessive. The indulgence had, however, been granted to the officers to draw rations, or rather provisions, for their wives and families at contract prices. But it was not considered that a case had been made out for any extra allowances owing to the high rate of accommodation. He believed that accommodation had become very dear, but nearly all the officers were provided with quarters.

INDIA — CLAIMS OF INDIAN OFFICERS. QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Who

ther he will lay upon the table his proposed despatch relative to the claims of Indian officers, reported upon by the late Commission, previous to the issuing of any warrant by the Crown bearing on that question, so that the House may have an opportunity of considering the plan therein proposed before a final decision shall have been come to?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he fully admitted that the question presented some peculiar features, but he was not sure that it was sufficiently important to induce him to depart from the course which the constitution imposed upon him, as a Minister of the Crown, not to submit to the decision of the House of Commons a question of purely Executive administration.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to know whether the despatch which was the cause of all the mischief had been submitted to the Crown?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the warrant had been submitted to Her Majesty.

EDUCATION—SUPPLEMENTARY RULES.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he rose to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, When the "Supplementary Rules," recently issued by the Committee of Council, will be laid upon the table; and whether he will consent to defer the operation of those Rules until they had been laid upon the table?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, in reply, that these Rules had been published, and there was no reason why they should not be laid on the table immediately. They had been already in operation some time, and consequently their operation could not be deferred. They had been drawn up in consequence of recommendations which had reached the Board from the managers and masters of a great many of the schools.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman denied that the Rules had the operation of withdrawing the grant in certain cases, and diminishing it in others?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he was not aware that they had that effect.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is in a position to contradict the statement which has appeared in the public press, to the effect that a Resolution has been carried in the State of New York, declaring that for the future the interest of foreign bondholders is to be paid in paper, instead of in bullion?

MR. LAYARD said, that the Government had no official information on the subject.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he intends, upon Thursday next, to move the Estimate for the erection of a New National Gallery at Burlington House, and whether he will state the terms upon which the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square is proposed to be given up to the Royal Academy?

MR. COWPER said, he did not propose to move on Thursday next the Estimate to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded, inasmuch as it would not have remained long enough on the table to enable hon. Members to consider it. With respect to the other Question, he thought it would be premature to come to any decision as to the terms upon which the National Gallery was proposed to be given up to the Royal Academy, until the House should have had an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to the proposal of erecting the National Gallery upon the site of Burlington House. When that Question had been determined it would be time to decide what ought to be done with the building in Trafalgar Square. As two or three years must elapse between the voting of the Estimate and the completion of the building, it would be unnecessary to settle these terms at the present moment.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he wished to know whether there will be any objection to lay on the table a plan of Burlington House and grounds?

MR. COWPER said, that he had a plan which he believed he should be able to place in the Library to-morrow. The plan would fully explain to hon. Members what it was proposed to do with regard to the site.

MR. HIBBERT said, he thought that the House ought to be put in possession of more than the ground-plan.

MR. COWPER said, he believed that the plan he had referred to would furnish the hon. Gentleman with all the information he required.

TAXATION.—SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. WHITE* rose to move for "a Select Committee to inquire into the operation and incidence of our present fiscal system, and to consider and report if any and what measures could be devised to secure a more equitable adjustment of the burden of Imperial taxation." The hon. Gentleman said, he knew the House would acquit him of obtrusiveness or presumption in rising to address them on this question. Ever since he had had the honour of a seat in that House he had been especially solicitous that this Motion should be brought before them. He thought that the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the operation and incidence of our present financial system, for the purpose of suggesting measures of fiscal amelioration and social advancement, would be a source of great satisfaction to the people of this country. This was not a party or a class topic; it affected alike the interests of every subject of the realm. He should be exhausting the patience of the House if he were to attempt to go into a full examination of this question, and he must content himself with a statement which was far from commensurate with its extent and importance. But if he were asked why he attempted it, he would point to the chronic dissatisfaction of the country with reference to taxation, and would ask whether there might not be some valid reason why men possessed of ample means were disposed to shirk and evade the discharge of their necessary burdens. He did not believe that there was anything inherent in British subjects which led them to evade the duties they owed to their Sovereign; such a proceeding could only spring from a feeling in their minds that they had not justice done to them, and which thus induced them to avoid the claims of the tax-gatherer. Since the House had now apparently acquiesced in an annual expenditure of £67,000,000, he thought the time had arrived when they should investigate how this vast sum might be raised in a manner least burdensome and detrimental to the progress of the nation. If the result of the labours of the Committee which he wished to be appointed should be a substantial approval of their present fiscal system, then it would remove the erroneous impressions which existed in the public mind; but if otherwise, then the basis would be laid of future beneficial legislation. He thought it would not be too much to say, even in a British House of Commons, that they had reached the ultimate bounds of scientific research or economic inquiry. The House would remember that until 1628 the old constitutional method of raising supplies for the service of the Crown was by direct, and not by indirect taxation. He held in his hand a treatise entitled a Declaration and Protestation against the illegal, detestable, and oft-condemned tax or extortion of Excise in general, by the celebrated William Prynne. He proved that it was not the Parliament but the King, Charles I., who originally attempted to levy excise duties. In the year 1628 two celebrated lawyers, Members of that House, Coke and Glanvil, protested against the system as a new prodigy, a monstrum horrendum. The House of Commons demanded a conference with the Lords with reference to this excise duty. They unanimously agreed that the attempt was against the law and the Petition of Right, and after this conference with the Lords they fully and unanimously resolved that it ought to be "eternally"—he would not repeat the word, which modern refinement forbade him to pronounce. At intervals since that period the prevalence of a base sordid feeling had been too commonly observed, inducing every person—he might say every class of the community—to take care of itself, and let the Chancellor of the Exchequer take the hindmost. He was disposed to think, if this Committee were appointed, a kindlier and better feeling would spring up between those who paid and those who expended the taxes of the country. If he wanted an argument in favour of the Committee being appointed, he might urge that he could not make out that there ever had been a Committee appointed on the general incidence of taxation. To some lovers of precedent that might be an objection, but he was not of that opinion. Although they had had Committees of Inquiry in reference to special taxes or exceptional burdens, and taxes affecting particular classes, yet, as far as he could discover, they had never yet had—and he thought they were now fully entitled to have—a Committee appointed that would take a comprehensive survey of our whole system of national taxation. Some weeks ago, on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Dunne), a Committee was appointed to inquire into the taxation of Ireland. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) also declared that the agriculturists were exposed to burdens from which other classes were exempt. He did not bring forward this Motion in any spirit of party or for the interest of any particular class. His object was that the Committee should dispassionately address itself to this great question, and he believed that the country would derive much advantage from its labours. He should be glad if the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) would preside over it, and if the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) would give it the benefit of his assistance. Quite recently they had a debate on the incidence of the malt tax, and the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) would have ample opportunity to bring all his facts and figures in reference to that duty before the Committee, so that the House might arrive at a proper decision upon a subject which promised to excite a large amount of public attention. With regard to the malt tax, it was connected with a much larger and greater question, and that was the revenue derived from the spirit duties. The abolition of the malt tax itself involved a sacrifice of five and a half millions, but the whole question must be deliberately looked at in the face, and it must be asked whether the abolition as now contemplated would not peril or compromise the fourteen millions from ardent spirits, which was now brought into the national exchequer. The right hon. Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) in his financial statement of 1852 proposed a remission of one half of the malt duty, but he very properly accompanied that reduction with an augmentation of the house tax. This was one of the subjects to which the attention of the Committee might well be directed. If the Committee were appointed, one important consideration for them would be to determine how far the working classes were benefited by recent fiscal legislation. He very much doubted whether they had derived so much advantage therefrom as was generally supposed. It must not be forgotten that in 1857 the House in hot haste struck off the war tax upon incomes, but left the war duty on tea up to last year, and that on sugar up to within a few days ago. Whilst the war duties were kept on these two articles of universal consumption the income tax was reduced by the large amount of £5,750,000. If he wanted another reason for the appointment of such a Committee it would be afforded to him in the slow process of economic science as applied to our financial system. For instance, the commercial treaty with France proposed by Mr. Pitt in 1787 was even more liberal than that which did such credit to his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale. Again, in 1784, a Member of that House, referring to Adam Smith, said the principles of that great political economist would convince that century and govern the next, and as yet Pulteney's prediction remained unfulfilled. He would like the Committee to inquire whether our financial policy was based on the principles of Adam Smith. Those principles were, that every one should contribute to the support of the State in proportion to the revenue which he enjoyed under its protection, and that every tax ought to be so contrived as to take out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above the amount which it brought into the national treasury. As Mr. Stuart Mill said, those were the orthodox canons of an honest and a just taxation. Then he should like the Committee to test the merits or demerits of direct and indirect taxation respectively. This was a most important matter, and one on which he was glad to know the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perfectly impartial, for in the right hon. Gentleman's Budget speech of 1861 was this very amusing apologue, which he was sure the House would gladly hear again—

"I never can think," said the right hon. Gentleman, "of direct and indirect taxation, except as I should think of two attractive sisters who have been introduced into the gay world of London, each with an ample fortune, both having the same parentage (necessity and invention), differing only as sisters may differ, as where one is of lighter and another of darker complexion, or where there is some agreeable variety of manner, the one being more free and open and the other more shy, retiring, and insinuating. I cannot conceive any reason why there should be unfriendly rivalry between the admirers of these two damsels; and I frankly own, whether it be due to a lax sense of moral obligation or not, that as Chancellor of the Exchequer, if not as a Member of this House, I have always thought it not only allowable, but even an act of duty, to pay my addresses to them both. I am, therefore, as between direct and indirect taxation perfectly impartial."

He hoped the Committee would allow those damsels, like the goddesses of old, to display all their charms, and that the right hon. Gentleman, like Paris, could award the golden apple to the Venus Victrix of Finance. The Committee would do great good if they only determined the exact burden which the consumers of taxed articles paid. That was a very important point. If the original cost of an article was £100, and it was subject to a duty of £50, it was quite obvious that ultimately the consumer must pay profit, not only on the original £100, but also on the £50 charged for duty. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue stated in their last Report that the duty on beer was a farthing a pint. Now, he was told that the remission of this duty would lead to a reduction in the price of the article to the consumer of, not a halfpenny, but a penny per quart. But political economists differed very much as to the amount by which the price of an article, over and above the sum paid to the State, was raised on the consumer by an excise or customs duty, some estimating it as much as 70 per cent, and others only at 25 per cent. He, therefore, thought the question one of very great importance, and one which would very legitimately come within the scope of such an inquiry as he wished to have undertaken by a Committee. He believed his estimate was not an extravagant one when he said that by the Excise and Customs duties of last year, amounting to £41,439,000, a sum of at least £54,500,000—that was £13,000,000 more than what found its way into the Exchequer—was taken out of the pockets of the people. Another valid reason for the appointment of the Committee was to be found in the uncertain and conflicting estimates we had of the value of the real and personal property of the United Kingdom. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, in the year 1859, estimated the total value of the real and personal property of the country, excluding those persons who had under £100, at £6,700,000,000 sterling. An eminent statistical writer in the Edinburgh Review held that the estimate of his hon. Friend was £1,000,000,000 in excess; but at about the same time Professor Leoni Levi computed the real and personal property of the country at £6,000,000,000 and an American statistician of eminence had quite recently estimated it at £6,900,000,000 sterling. He confessed he thought the original estimate of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham correct. Mr. Coode, in his elaborate Report on Fire Insurance, had estimated the insured, the insurable, and the uninsurable property of England and Wales at £6,000,000,000 sterling, say £340 per head for every man, woman, and child in England and Wales, and added his estimate was an extremely low one. He should like to know, too, what was the annual increase of the national wealth. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his financial statement of 1861 asked, in speaking of the annual savings of the country—

“What are the annual savings of the country? May we take them at £50,000,000? Enormous as that sum is, I believe it may be taken as the amount which the skill and the capital, and the industry and the thrift of England, may be computed to lay by every year.”

The opinion of the Economist, an authority which the right hon. Gentleman would not deny, was that in the five years between 1854 and 1859 the annual savings of the country were on the average £114,000,000, and that the savings of last year were £130,000,000. In another statistical paper they were estimated at £150,000,000, and some statisticians had put them at £200,000,000 during the past year. It would be interesting, too, to ascertain what was the amount of the annual income of the country, for that was a point on which the authorities varied widely—between £500,000,000 and £750,000,000. The Liverpool Financial Reform Association estimated it at £650,000,000, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he thought, put it at £560,000,000—at least, he assumed so from a speech made at Chester, in which he said that each person paid about one-eighth of his income to the State, and he was then obtaining some £70,000,000 a year from the resources of the people. If the Committee were appointed, no doubt all these points would be set at rest. The right hon. Gentleman, in his last financial statement, deliberately and authoritatively told the House that the time was come when the country ought to consider, and Parliament ought to decide, what course it ought to take with regard to the income tax. Now, as far as he (Mr. White) could judge, the country had already decided that the income tax, on account of its obvious inequalities, was an elaborate injustice, and Parliament would have long since abolished this odious impost did not our financial extravagance make it necessary that some other tax should be substituted in its place. No one had more vigorously denounced this tax than the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman said in 1858 that the income tax tended more than any other tax to demoralize and corrupt the people. In a recent article in the Economist there were some excellent remarks on this subject. The writer urges in favour of a direct tax on the propertied classes—

“The Customs yield a revenue of £24,000,000; but there is hardly an article of luxury charged at the Custom House. Speaking roughly, the Customs duties are taxes on physical necessities (or what have become such) or physical enjoyments. We have been abandoning Customs duties paid by the rich, and have been taxing for a vast revenue articles consumed by the lower and middle order of mankind. We need not observe that in a country like England our taxation ought not only to be fair in reality, but fair in seeming—conspicuously fair. The rich alone impose the taxes which poor as well as rich pay; and unless, therefore, there is some large unmistakable tax, which no one can overlook, that taxes very rich people much the most, there will always be, perhaps there ought always to be, bitterness and dissatisfaction.”

He did not agree with the hon. Member for Buckingham, that the inequalities and injustice inherent in the income tax could be removed. But if the Committee could devise some fair direct tax as a substitute for that on incomes they would confer a great benefit on the country. Of the £70,000,000 of revenue, but £15,000,000 were now raised by taxes which affected only the owners of the visible property of the country. It might also inquire into the best mode of remitting or reducing the taxes which confessedly pressed heaviest on the comforts and the means of the working classes. According to a Return moved for by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, there were in existence on the 31st of December, 1862, 332 Co-operative societies with a capital of £429,315, and a sale of goods amounting in the year to £2,341,640. He had seen a calculation, based on the actual sales of some of those societies, in an excellent pamphlet by Mr. Francis, of Manchester, which proved that a working man with a wife and three children, earning from £50 to £60 a year, paid in indirect taxes £11 18s. 7d., or about 20 per cent of his entire income; and the Liverpool Association calculate that a family of the same number, earning 25s. a week, would ordinarily pay in taxes and consequent charges on sugar, tea, coffee, tobacco, and beer, to the amount of 5s. 9d. a week, or nearly 3d. in every shilling of their earnings. It should be borne in mind that the duty levied was out of all proportion to that which it ought to be on articles which had now become, if not absolute, at all events conventional necessities of life. Even at the present reduced rate he found that tea now paid on an average 83 per cent; that consumed by the poor 100 per cent; while sugar now paid quite 33 per cent, and coffee about the same amount. For himself he believed that the present fiscal system pressed unduly on the working classes. The working classes might be said to pay a property tax of 20 per cent, their wages being their only property, and those wages were mulcted 4s. in the pound by the present system of indirect taxation. Mr. McCulloch, recently writing on this subject, pointed out that, while nearly all the duties levied on commodities which contributed to the luxurious enjoyments of the rich were abolished, the duty on spirits, which were in some respects the luxury of the poor, had undergone successive augmentations. There were, however, other considerations connected with ardent spirits beyond increasing the area of consumption, and the policy pursued by the Government with respect to them—namely, obtaining the largest amount of duty from the smallest possible area, was in his opinion correct. With reference to the spirit duties he might further observe that he found we raised from the Excise and Customs duties on home, foreign, and colonial spirits, £13,250,000, or about one-fifth of our entire revenue. He would also say, with regard to the tea and sugar duties, that he thought the House ought to be prepared to entirely abolish them before reducing the spirit duties, inasmuch as the best interests of the working classes were bound up with the ability of procuring tea and sugar at the lowest possible price. Reverting to the pressure of taxation on the working classes, he learnt from a good authority (Mr. S. C. Kell, of Bradford), that an artisan was practically taxed by our system of indirect taxation at the rate of 4s. per week, assuming that he earned only 20s. Now he need hardly remind the House that any tax levied injuriously on the rich, because they happened to be rich, would operate almost as prejudicially on the poor as if levied on themselves, and it might be equally true that any tax levied injuriously on the poor might react to the disadvantage of the rich. Let the £7,000,000 they paid annually for poor's rates, and the incessant demands upon the rich, be accepted as the penalty which the rich must pay for disobeying the laws of a sound and just system of taxation. Justice in this case was the truest expediency. As the Emperor of the French once said, "Providence never designed that one class should be made happy at the expense of another." The Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House last year that of the £41,000,000 levied by the customs and excise quite three-fourths, or some four millions more than the whole amount of the interest on the National Debt, were raised from consumers so poor that the great majority of them were compelled to expend all their earnings in obtaining the barest necessities of life. In this country the annual consumption of tea was only 2½ lb. per head, whereas in Australia it was 14 lb. per head. In the Northern States of America the consumption of tea was only one-half what it was in England, but then their consumption of coffee was six times greater than ours. The truth was English statesmen had never taken sufficient account of the magic influence of a full belly. He would not trouble the House with a reference in detail to the continental systems of taxation. A Return on the subject was laid on the table of the House in 1842, setting forth the population and respective amounts of direct and indirect taxation in various countries. That Return, owing to the efflux of time, was not now quotable, but according to the Almanach de Gotha and the Statesman's Year Book it would, however, appear that the weight of taxation on the Continent fell on those by whom it could be best borne, and it was those who possessed most that paid most. It appeared from a Return laid upon the table of the House, that the present average annual taxation of Great Britain per head was 53s., an instance of fiscal exaction, in a time of peace, unexampled in the history of the world. The ten years before the Russian war the average taxation per head of Great Britain and Ireland was 38s.; seven years after the war the average annual taxation was 48s. per head. So that while the population had increased but 5 per cent the total Imperial taxation had increased more than 25 per cent. Supposing the Committee for which he asked were appointed, it would be interesting to take some evidence of the system of taxation in America, particularly as to how direct taxation was levied in some of the best ordered of the Northern States. For local or State purposes he believed it was usual to levy a direct property tax varying from  $\frac{3}{4}$  to 1 per cent, the poor man paying according to his little and the rich man according to his much, each knowing how much he paid and what he paid it for. The population of the State of Massachusetts last year was 1,300,000, and the direct taxation of the State was £1,300,000, or £1 per head. Supposing the estimate he had quoted of the real and personal property of the United Kingdom to be correct—namely £8,000,000,000, a tax of 5s. per cent would give £20,000,000 per annum, which would enable the Government not only to abolish the income tax but the customs duties on tea, sugar, ~~pepper~~, and other articles of domestic consumption. The late Sir Robert Peel, when he introduced the income tax, said that the persons who paid it would be more than compensated by the reduction on articles of consumption; and he (Mr. White) was encouraged to believe that a perseverance in the same policy would be attended with like results. The hon. Member for Rochdale, in a remarkable letter read at the Social Science Association last year, said—

"No one can deny that Customs and Excise duties, and other indirect taxes, are more costly than direct taxation; and no one can doubt that they have injured commerce, and checked the production of wealth."

Seeing that the poor and other rates, amounting to £19,000,000, are now annually raised by direct taxation, is it not well worthy of legislative inquiry whether the £60,000,000 or £65,000,000 needed for Imperial purposes might not be mainly levied after the same fashion, in lieu of the present octroi or wretched "Tally" system of indirect taxation. Next to the poorer classes who would be benefited by a revision of taxation, I entertain a confident belief that the class who would most benefit would be the landed proprietors. Land is a certain quantity, and cannot be increased, while capital is a variable quantity, and has a great tendency to increase. Landed proprietors, therefore, would be benefited more than any other class, except the poorer classes of the country. Considering what advancement had been already made by the remission of duties, it would be impossible to over-estimate the stupendous results which would follow if the whole country became one free port to all the world, and everything were allowed to come in and go out without let or hindrance. It would vastly increase employment to the people of the country; it would augment the consumption of tea, coffee, and other articles of food, not only to double, but to treble the present extent. If the condition of our people were raised to that pitch at which they would be enabled to procure all that was necessary to sustain them in a healthy and vigorous existence, the prosperity of this country must be immensely promoted. The poor's rate would dwindle away, and in the interest of the poor themselves it might be found advisable to abandon compulsory relief. Seeing the marvellous prosperity which had resulted from the commercial legislation of the last twenty-five years, through which our Foreign trade had so rapidly increased from £100,000,000 to a grand total of £444,000,000, or about one-and-a-half million for each working day of last year, they had every encouragement to go forward without faltering in the same direction. It was worth the while of the Legislature to inquire why, with this great prosperity, such a vast amount of poverty existed even now in the country. At the present moment one in every twenty-three of the population was a pauper, and there were in the United Kingdom not less than 1,347,495 paupers, to say nothing of the millions that were on the brink of pauperism. Besides this, there was the vast amount of poverty relieved by private means, and the indigence reluctant to receive relief, as evidenced by the occasional deaths by starvation, to which was to be added the increase of the crime of infanticide. He hoped the day would soon arrive when the poorer classes of the people would be relieved from paying an undue quota of the taxation of the country. It might scarcely be believed that in the eighteen months prior to the 30th June, 1862, there were found dead in ditches and other places 921 children under two years of age, and the total number of children of the same age who had met with untimely deaths in the same period was 5,547. He must be permitted to anticipate an objection which would probably be made to his Motion. No doubt he would be told that, supposing there was an abolition of the duties upon the various articles to which he had referred, it would not benefit the working classes, but that in the course of time wages would accommodate themselves to the altered state of things. That was a great argument in the time of the anti-Corn Law agitation. They were persistently told that wages would certainly fall just in proportion as the price of corn was lowered, but what was the fact? He found that so far from wages falling with the price of corn, they had risen, especially in the manufacturing districts. He thought he could interpret the feelings of the working classes when he said that they did not wish for exemption from Imperial taxation; but what they complained of was the disproportionate amount of taxation which now pressed upon them. He would ask the House whether it was not degrading them to mix up the cost of food, drink, and of Government together in their system of taxation, and to make them pay the excessive cost of that bad mixture? He believed the Committee which he moved for would be of great public advantage, and that the time was eminently favourable for the calm, deliberate, and dispassionate discussion of this great question, owing to the total absence of any party rancour or feeling. He had not brought forward this Motion in any spirit of self-seeking, for he would be content to occupy the humblest place in that Committee; but he submitted his Motion with the earnest desire to direct the attention of the House to a subject which sooner or later must attract universal interest. He hoped the present Parliament would not be amenable to the same reproach as was recorded against the one of 1796. He found it written in the latest and best summary of their constitutional history by the accomplished Gentleman who sat at the table (Mr. Erskine May), that the Commons of that age were ever ready to mulct the people at the bidding of the Minister, and were yet unwilling to bear their own proper burden, and refused to grant to Mr. Pitt such a tax on their landed property as he proposed, and which, in 1853, a reformed Parliament, intent upon sparing industry, imposed in the form of a succession duty, at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He cherished the profound conviction that the House, whatever might be the result of his Motion, would act on the sound State policy contained in a paper written by the ever-to-be-lamented Prince Consort, which declared that the interests of all classes, too often contrasted, were identical, and that it was only ignorance which prevented them from uniting for each other's advantage. The hon. Gentleman, in conclusion, moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation and incidence of our present fiscal system, and to consider and report if any and what measures could be devised to secure a more equitable adjustment of the burden of Imperial taxation.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART rose to second the Motion, in the firm belief that the proposed inquiry would be for the benefit of all classes, not excepting the owners of land. About two years since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks compared the landed interest to a milch cow; and that figure might be accepted when it was borne in mind that a milch cow upon a dairy farm was much better fed than a cow upon an ordinary farm, where all the turnips were sent to market. And so it would be better for the landed interest to submit to some well-devised plan of direct taxation, which would enable the country to get rid of those taxes which now pressed heavily upon the working classes, and to a certain extent were injurious to the owners of land. If they looked back to what took place after the close of the last great war, they found that in 1821 landowners were described as being in great difficulties, although at that time the landed interest did not contribute directly to the Imperial taxation. Now, however, land was rising in value, and there were numerous competitors for any vacant farm, although the landed interest now did contribute a moderate sum to the taxation of the country. One of the great objects of his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) was to get rid of any taxes still existing which crippled the industry and pressed on the resources of the working classes of the population, and which indirectly kept down the value of land. The results of the fiscal changes which had taken place since 1842 might be gathered from the value of the fixed property of the country; and, notwithstanding the imposition of the income tax and the great changes in the Customs duties, it appeared from Schedule A that this had risen upwards of 40 per cent in value. It might be said that the increase was owing mainly to the number of additional houses; but landed proprietors, he thought, would gladly receive building instead of agricultural rents; and in land alone there had been a rise in value of upwards of 10 per cent between 1844 and 1861, while in that time the increased taxation cast upon land by the income tax had not been more than 7 per cent even during the height of the Crimean war. Before the House of Lords' Committee it had been stated that railways generally raised the value of adjoining properties from 6 to 16 per cent.

There was, however, a much shorter way by which his brother landowners could procure the benefits of these lines than by imposing mortgages upon their properties, and that was by removing all restrictions upon the industry and enterprise of the people, and by taking upon their own shoulders a moderate portion of the taxation necessary for that purpose. If measures of this kind were not adopted there was only too much reason to fear that the attractions offered by the colonies, and the facilities for reaching them, would prove too great for the classes whom it should be their object to keep at home. The industrial history of Europe afforded many examples of nations which had been ruined by unwise taxation. England was quite as much exposed to competition in the neutral markets of the world as they had been; and if capital and industry died away, as in Spain, or remained stationary, as in Holland, British landowners might whistle for their rents. No one was a more competent witness on this subject than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, who in his interesting tale Sybil depicted most truly the heavy sufferings entailed on the working classes by the iniquitous system of taxation which, to use his own words, "began in the time of the Venetian oligarchy." Since the time when that work was written a great deal had been done to alleviate the pressure of such taxation. But he asked those conversant with the circumstances whether it was altogether a thing of the past, or whether there was not ground for such a Motion as that before the House, and reason to hope that beneficial results might follow from it? The more these subjects were studied and understood, the more it would appear that rich and poor had no divergent interests, but that what was for the universal good was also for the good of the individual. The hon. Baronet the late Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Stafford Northcote) in his able compendium of financial policy for the last twenty years had shown how much more closely classes had been brought together during that period, and how much more harmony there was between them. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose influence with a large section of the House was so great, to continue the beneficial policy begun in 1842, of which he had been so firm a supporter; to the representatives of the landed interests, from which he himself derived almost everything he possessed; and to the Members of the House of Commons generally, to support a Motion having for its object to promote the welfare of so important a section of the community.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation and incidence of our present Fiscal System, and to consider and report if any and what measures could be devised to secure a more equitable adjustment of the burden of Imperial Taxation."—(Mr. James White.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I was in hopes that a subject of such great importance, and treated at such length, and with such force and clearness by my hon. Friends, might have led other Members to lay their views before the House; for I feel that the question of inquiry into our present system of taxation is one which the Government ought not to take exclusively into its own hands. But as no one has risen to address the House, I will venture to make this observation, which I think must have occurred to my hon. Friends who moved and seconded the Motion, that the very circumstance I have mentioned proves that, at present, there hardly exists in the House that degree of interest in so vast a question which would be absolutely necessary to enable the House to grapple with the enormous labour of the proposed inquiry. We must not conceal it from ourselves—I am sure my hon. Friend does not conceal it from himself—that his Motion bears no relation or resemblance whatever to an ordinary proposal for a Committee. When I observed the terms of his Motion upon the notice-paper that fact was at once obvious to me; but after the speech of my hon. Friend, I must say the terms of his Motion fell very short indeed—I will say immeasurably short—of the wonderful dilation and distension of probable labour which he has sketched out for us. In point of fact, it would be much more difficult to say what topics relating to taxation my hon. Friend has shut out from his inquiry than to enumerate those which he has included. Had my hon. Friend limited his proposal to any one of the subjects on which he has touched, the responsibility of undertaking the inquiry would still have been serious. But whether it be owing to the sanguine disposition of my hon. Friend, or to some other cause, it does appear to me that in the construction which he assigns to the terms "incidence and operation of taxation" he has acted so much in accordance with his own liberal disposition that he has laid on the prospective Committee, and on the prospective Chairman—of whom, by the way, in the person of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), I must say my hon. Friend has made an exceedingly judicious choice—a burden which will infallibly break their backs. My hon. Friend proposes to inquire into every branch of revenue, and every tax included in every branch. He proposes to consider it from every point of view from which it is capable of being regarded. For example, he would investigate the operation of each tax as it bears on each of the three kingdoms, and then on each class of society in each country. He would also investigate the matter with reference to the distinction between direct and indirect taxation. He aims not only at a fiscal, but a statistical result. My hon. Friend will not be satisfied with the noble Lord and the Committee unless they bring out by the inquiry an elaborate account of the capital value of the whole property of the country, its annual income, and the annual increment of that income. And as my hon. Friend cannot form a judgment of the bearing of our system of taxation without investigating those of other countries, he would, doubtless, extend his regards to the system of taxation abroad. The taxation of the United States is to be brought within the purview of the Committee; and, indeed, such is my hon. Friend's zeal in seeking for information wherever it can be found, that every country that has an organized scheme of taxation will supply useful hints and suggestions. This is not an exaggerated, but a very slight and hasty sketch of the view he takes of the duties of the Committee. Now, I submit, that a plan of this nature, if it were ever reduced to practice, would require that those who propounded it should begin with a process very disagreeable to a man of philosophic mind—he must break up his scheme into pieces, and be content to deal with one member of it, or, at least, with some one or more restricted and manageable number of the very numerous and profoundly important topics that he has started. He appears to think that there exists in this country a chronic discontent, an ineradicable disposition to escape from the payment of taxes; and he seems to think that this is a phenomenon peculiar to ourselves, and due not to any ordinary or prevalent vice or infirmity of mankind, but due rather to the faults of our fiscal system, which might, by judicious care, be corrected. There, again, I differ from him. Now, Sir, whether it be that approaching age which chills a man's views of life and human nature I cannot tell, but I confess I do entertain a lower estimate of human nature in this respect. I am afraid that, labour as we will, and patch and cobble and make and mend as we may, we shall never get rid of that disposition, which a large portion of mankind cherish—perhaps unknown to themselves—to reduce to a minimum the sum they contribute as individuals towards the necessities of the State. My hon. Friend appears to think that this disease is local, temporary, and peculiar. In my opinion it is cosmopolitan, everlasting, and universal; in no country in the world where taxes are paid are they regarded as otherwise than a pestilent grievance. But has there been no improvement in our taxation? Happily, our system of taxation has undergone, within the last twenty or thirty years, a radical change. I am by no means of opinion that nothing remains to be done; but neither do I believe that any such changes, either in principle or amount, remain to be effected as those of the last twenty or thirty years. My hon. Friend seemed to argue, from the great reduction which had taken place in indirect taxation, that we might go on progressively to its extinction. I do not deny that from certain points of view direct taxation has undoubtedly immense advantages. It has this immense benefit—you take from the pockets of the taxpayer nothing but what you put into the public treasury—except of course the cost of collection. In indirect taxation, on the contrary, you take from the pockets of the taxpayer a great deal that does not come into the Exchequer. I do not deny that the direct tax is the perfect tax. But what is the use of knowing that, when you have not to devise a theory or elaborate a system as philosophers, but to pay the daily charges of the Treasury, and when you have to deal with the flesh and blood of mankind? When you attempt to realise this theory of direct taxation you are met by this obstacle—impossibility. In addition to £18,000,000 of taxation required for local objects, you have to raise from £65,000,000 to £70,000,000 for Imperial purposes. How to raise this sum by direct taxation is a matter which debating societies and clubs may dispute as long as they please, but towards which we can make no sensible approximation by any measures for which a British Minister would be responsible, or which a British House of Commons would pass. Let it not be supposed, meanwhile, that our direct taxation is increasing in amount. It is difficult to determine with precision what is indirect taxation. We see plainly that the Customs and Excise are indirect taxes. The taxes raised for local purposes—the income tax, the succession duty, the land tax, and one or two others are direct taxes. There is between the two a margin of disputable ground; but it cannot be said that at the present moment our fiscal system shows any preference of one class over another. There never was anyone more anxious to reduce the class of indirect imposts than the late Sir Robert Peel; but towards the end of his life he was of opinion that the direct taxes of this country for a time of peace had very nearly reached their furthest limit. My experience is that flesh and blood form the great obstacle to the extinction of indirect taxation, and that obstacle will remain. During the time that I have held the office of Finance Minister—and I presume that my predecessors would say the same—there has not been a single day in which I have not received representations illustrative of the difficulty of levying direct taxes; and I speak within the mark when I say that though our direct taxes, as far as the Exchequer is concerned, form but a small proportion of the public income, at least 49-50ths of all the trouble, personal vexation, annoyance, and discontent incident to the payment of money for the purposes of the State, arise out of direct taxation. I grant that if we go back twenty-five years ago, when our commercial and fiscal laws were of the most complicated character, the case was very different. They were then full of every sort of inconvenience. At every stage the whole operations of commerce bristled with points at which trade and industry were interfered with, thwarted, baffled, perplexed, and annoyed by the provisions of the law. But the long and constant labours of this House have essentially altered this state of things, and I believe that it is now rare to meet with anything that can be properly called vexation and annoyance connected with the payment of the indirect taxes—I mean, of course, by those who pay them in the first instance. My hon. Friend has placed some difficulty in the way of a Motion of this kind, by indicating with ingenious candour the nature of the changes that are likely to result from the labours of this Committee. If this were the time, and the circumstances were favourable, it would be necessary for those who acceded to the appointment of the Committee, to indicate to what extent these changes were to be taken into their contemplation. My hon. Friend speaks of the abolition of the income tax, and likewise of a large amount of the indirect taxes of the country. I perfectly agree with my hon. Friend as to the benefits that have resulted to the landed interest from our recent commercial policy; but still we must remember that that policy has not consisted in the extirpation of indirect taxation. It has, indeed, often been so described, sometimes by its friends, but more frequently by its opponents. Let the fact stand on record, that our indirect taxation, after all its pruning, is more vigorous and more productive now than it has ever been. Therefore, the inferences which might be drawn, within the limits in which Parliament has been acting, are not fair, and must be founded upon measures of a more sweeping and, if I may say so, of a more revolutionary kind. My hon. Friend has indicated the means by which indirect taxation would be extinguished. He would impose a property tax of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, and when he says  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, he thinks the dose so mild that no man can possibly feel any difficulty in acceding to a Committee which is to end in a proposal of so moderate a description. And my hon. Friend thinks, also, that he would derive advantage, not only with the rest of the community, but even a peculiar benefit from the adoption of this plan. He would have to pay this  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, it is true, but then he would be free, on the other hand, from the income tax, which is  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, from the tea duty, from the sugar duty, from the duty on coffee, from the duty on pepper, from the wine duty, and from the duty on beer. [Mr. WHITE: Not at a  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent.] Well, then, with the  $\frac{1}{4}$  raised to a  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, the thing would be easy. But this  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent which sounds so innocent and so modest, is a war income tax of 10 per cent on the landed proprietors. No doubt the landed proprietors would be willing to pay this tax in case of need or in war; but if this plan of my hon. Friend were to be applied as a fiscal reform, the landed proprietor would naturally ask whether everybody else were going to pay in the same proportion? My hon. Friend says there are a thousand millions' worth of property in the country. But in that he includes every chair and every table in every cottage of the country. I think my hon. Friend would have enormous difficulty in carrying his plan into effect. I am told he would never get over the first preliminary difficulties of valuation. I do not think he has ever weighed the amount of practical obstacles with which his plan would be impeded in the very matter of valuation. My hon. Friend refers us to the Northern States of America. I find in the New York Almanac that every man who has a house in New York is set down and in a parallel column the amount of his property. But then there is a process called "sweating down," which must have been awfully applied to the fortunes of the citizens of New York. It is notorious that there are in New York a considerable number of gentlemen who may be called Merchant Princes, and there are several in that city who are worth many hundred thousand pounds a piece. I have looked through this book, and it appears from it that there is not a single man in New York who is worth £100,000. Well, if it be true that these New York gentlemen are in the habit of writing down eighty, sixty, or fifty, where they ought to write one hundred, and if the same plan be pursued in this country, then our thousand millions' worth of property will shrink, and the  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent property tax will have to raise its proportion inversely; the 10 per cent income tax which I have described, will grow to an income tax of 15 or 20 per cent; and what the end of this process which begins under such promising auspices may be I will not say. I, for one, think it my first duty to avoid holding out any expectations to Parliament or the country with regard to which I do not feel a reasonable hope that our legislative labours of one kind or another would be likely to realize them. And if that be so, I must say, I think it is for the House of Commons to avoid acceding to any proposal, be it what it may, which aims at fundamental changes in our system of taxation—first, because I believe those changes are not required in justice, and secondly, because I am convinced they will be found impracticable, in consequence of the obstacles which would encounter any attempt to give them effect. I do not mean, however, to apply the doctrine of finality to legislative finance. It would be perfectly easy to point out—and in this all sides of the House would concur—that we have abundance of taxes which still call for the reforming hand; but I hope they would also concur in this, that it is better not to talk too much about their removal until we have made the best of the relation between income and expenditure. What I would say is this—that any Committee which contemplated occupying even a small portion of the field which my hon. Friend has traced out would require to be appointed not merely with the general concurrence, but with the general desire of the House of Commons, and to be proposed under the auspices of the executive Government of the day, whatever that Government might be, and unquestionably not at a period when we may hope that a full moiety of the Session is already past. My hon. Friend is aware that if he were to obtain a Committee of this kind his first steps would be necessarily some of the most formidable of his labours, and he would hardly have overcome the first of these preliminary difficulties before he would find that the members of his Committee were gradually disappearing into the country, and his labours for this year were at an end. I am far from discouraging him from attempting anything which may be brought within the scope of an ordinary Committee, but I think his own views would require to be reduced within much narrower limits. For the present, I trust he will be satisfied with having had an opportunity of making known to the House and to the country a great deal which he deems of importance in this matter, and that he will not ask the House to pronounce an opinion upon his Resolution.

MR. O'REILLY said, that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) deserved the serious consideration of the House, though the hon Gentleman, in the speech in which he had introduced it, had rather damaged his case by enlarging too much the scope of his inquiry, and to a certain extent prejudging the issue by pointing out so strongly the conclusions which he thought would be arrived at. It would be clearly impossible that any Committee could enter into all the details of the taxation not only of this, but of other countries, and decide upon all the disputed points. But, as our finance had now got beyond a state of empiricism, and we had been endeavouring to place our taxation upon a sound basis, he thought that the time had come when we might inquire into the principles of taxation and endeavour to discover in what direction our further steps should tend. He was, therefore, of opinion that the Resolution indicated a line of investigation which was sound in itself, and adapted to the powers of a Committee of that House. There had been a time when the only principle of taxation recognized in this and other countries was to get at the money of the people in any way it could be done, and the grand object was to conceal from the taxpayer the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was drawing any money from him. That principle we had abandoned. The early period of our history had been one of direct taxation; and it was not until a time much more advanced that we commenced that system of indirect taxation which now weighed so heavily and unjustly upon so large a portion of the community. We had slowly and gradually been retracing our steps; but still three quarters of the amount produced by our taxes was raised indirectly. Abroad, however, the case was different. In Belgium nearly one-third of the taxes was raised by direct taxation, in France between one-third and one-fourth, in Denmark nearly half, and in Italy the greatest portion. It should not be considered for a moment that the attention of the Committee should be directed to the details of taxation. They should rather endeavour to define the principles by which taxation should be governed, and to determine the relative amounts produced by the two methods. They might also devote some attention to many collateral subjects such as the effects of taxation upon the inhabitants of Ireland. He believed that it would be found that the Irish sustained a greater pressure than did their neighbours in England, because the taxation upon the necessities of life must always press the hardest upon a poorer population. The examination of the Committee would, he believed, have the effect of, at all events, disproving one fallacy—namely, the belief that the taxes always weighed most severely where the amount contributed per head was the largest. It would also strengthen the position of future financial Ministers, by laying down principles by which they would be guided, and to which they would refer as a justification of their conduct. He thought, however, for the reason given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the hon. Gentleman could not press his Motion for a Committee this year; and he thought that when he brought it forward next Session he would act wisely if he made the terms of reference less extensive.

MR. W. EWART thought it a deplorable fact in our fiscal history that, whereas in foreign countries at least two-thirds of the national income were derived from direct taxation, with this country it was just the reverse. He believed that in time the labouring classes, as they increased in intelligence, would press for a more extended application of the system of direct taxation. Time would be the best friend of the hon. Member for Brighton.

INNS OF COURT.—LEAVE.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to enable the Benchers of the Inns of Court to appoint Judicial Committees in certain cases, and to give the necessary powers to such Committees, said, that hon. Members were probably aware that the Benchers of the Inns of Court exercised judicial or quasi-judicial functions. Any charge or complaint made against a barrister with a view to his being disbarred would be brought before them for decision, as would also any objection to a student about to be called to the bar, or to a student to whom permission was about to be given to enter one of the Inns. Those charges or complaints were investigated before the general body of the Benchers, who however, as a tribunal, were placed at great disadvantage. It was necessarily a changeable tribunal, and it was very often the case that the commencement of a complaint was heard by A, B, or C, continued by D, E, and F, progressing through the alphabet until it was finally decided by X, Y, and Z, who had not heard anything of the beginning of the case. Another defect in the tribunal was that it had not the power which was absolutely necessary for the exercise of any jurisdiction—the power of administering an oath, of compelling the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and of punishing for contempt. At present, when an accusation was made, the prosecutor was ready with his witnesses; but the person accused might have a difficulty in getting the evidence necessary for his defence, and so there might be a miscarriage of justice. This result had actually occurred in the case of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, against whom the Benchers decided; but, the case being afterwards submitted to a Committee of this House, they came to an opposite conclusion, and stated that the reason was the attendance before them of a certain witness whom the Benchers could not compel to attend. This showed the paramount importance of such a power. He, therefore, proposed that in any case in which the Benchers exercised judicial authority they should be empowered to elect from among their number a Judicial Committee of five to hear and determine the case, and this Committee should be intrusted with the powers which he had specified. This would be a great improvement in the administration of justice in the cases to which the Bill applied; and it would be very analogous to the change introduced by the Grenville Act into the practice of this House respecting election petitions. Before that time, all election petitions were heard at the Bar of the House, and, though the House had the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses, they could not administer an oath; but the Grenville Act referred these petitions to be disposed of by a Select Committee, giving them power to administer an oath. The Bill provided an appeal to the Judges of the Superior Courts. The Committees were to have all the powers of Courts of Record, including the power of administering an oath. He had spoken to several hon. and learned Friends in this House, who all approved the principle of the Bill, and he hoped that, with the improvements which would be effected in Committee, it would receive the assent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to enable the Benchers of the Inns of Court to appoint Judicial Committees in certain cases, and to give the necessary powers to such Committees, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE BOWYER, Mr. WILLIAM EWART, and Mr. HENNESSY.

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause full information to be given to this House on the subject of Treasure Trove; and, further, that She will cause such measures to be taken as may tend to make the enforcement of the rights of the Crown more uniform and more consistent with the legitimate claims of the owners of property where objects of interest and value are discovered, for which no owner can be found."

The hon. Baronet was addressing the House in support of his Motion, when—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BAINES *: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I shall receive an indulgent hearing from the House on this occasion, because I have to plead the cause of those who neither in person nor by their representatives are present among us. Moreover, I have to plead before an aristocratic jury for plebeian clients. For, strange as it may sound, this House of Commons, which I have the honour to address, is in the main an aristocratic assembly, with an admixture of the middle classes, and to a large extent nominated and influenced by those classes. I believe the House will at all times, so long as the structure of society remains as at present, continue to be an aristocratic assembly in a very considerable degree, because of the great advantages which rank, wealth, and the highest education give men for serving their country in a legislative capacity. But the grievance which is felt by those for whom I plead is, that the great bulk of the Commons of England have no voice whatever in returning the Commons House of Parliament. Of course, I do not mean to say that there are no boroughs and no counties in which there are working class electors; but the broad fact remains, that the working classes of England, with trivial exceptions, are not represented in this House. I feel this to be both my weakness and my strength;—my weakness, from the entire absence of the classes whose rights and interests are to be considered; but my strength, from the generosity and sense of justice which this House, in common with every assembly of Englishmen, habitually displays towards those who most need it. The House will perceive that the Bill which I now offer, and by which the franchise in boroughs would be extended from £10 to £6 occupiers, differs essentially from that offered by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey (Mr. Locke King), inasmuch as, whilst he sought only to give a fuller representation to classes already represented, it is my object to extend the range of representation by bringing it down lower, so as to take in some considerable and yet not excessive number of the working classes. It is well known that the working classes comprise about three-fourths of the population; and yet I may say, speaking generally, that they are excluded almost wholly from any participation in those privileges and franchises which are not only the machinery, but the very life and soul, of popular liberty. The hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave) has given notice that he shall move "the Previous Question," and I suppose I must infer from this that he does not intend to dispute the principle of the Bill, but rather the expediency of discussing the subject at this time. In the first place, with regard to time, allow me to say that it seems to me no time could possibly be better than the present for discussing a question of this nature. There was one practical difficulty which was not much mentioned when the subject was last before the House, but which every Member felt as a serious objection to the introduction of the subject at that time—namely, that a new Parliament had lately been elected, and it would have been inconvenient to Members and to the country at large that there should be another General Election so soon after the Election of 1859. But now the Parliament has entered on the sixth year of its existence, and the present Session must either be the last or the penultimate Session of its legal duration; and I apprehend that the question of extensively altering the franchise could never with so much advantage be brought before Parliament as when a Parliament is approaching its termination. On that ground, therefore, I conceive this is a much more favourable time for discussing the subject than when I first had the honour of introducing it. But it is said to be inexpedient, on account of there being no call for reform in the country—that even the working classes themselves are not demanding it, and consequently that it would be unwise to stir the question. If I were to admit this allegation to the fullest extent, as to some extent I do admit it, I cannot see how it would relieve us from the obligation which most of us distinctly incurred at the last General Election. I appeal to this side of the House at least, and I believe I may also appeal to some on the other side of the House, whether we did not at the last General Election promise to support a Bill more extensive in its provisions than the Bill which had been introduced by Lord Derby's Government. The £6 franchise proposed by Lord Russell was then before the country, and it was upon that the constituents declared their judgment and their wish. Again, I appeal to the House whether a period of political calm and industrial prosperity is not the very time in which it is most desirable to bring forward a question which is generally considered to have an agitating tendency. At the present time, I apprehend, there is no political measure which can legitimately interfere with the bringing forward of this question; and I do feel, therefore, that there is no substantial objection; for surely no Member would take ground so derogatory to the House as to argue that it should never act except under the coercion of popular agitation. The people have spoken out on the subject distinctly; we stand here as the expression of their opinion; and it is right that we should take the first convenient and favourable opportunity to carry out the pledges we have given. There have undoubtedly been causes which did tend in a certain degree, I will not say to create indifference, but rather to divert public attention and public interest from this great question of Parliamentary Reform. Those causes are perfectly familiar to all of us. We recollect the Session of vast excitement which almost immediately followed the last General Election. There was first the state of Europe; then there broke out the civil war in America; then there was the most alarming prostration of a great industry which has ever taken place within my recollection—the prostration of the great cotton industry; there was also a most happy event, which nevertheless led to immense discussion and excitement—the Commercial Treaty with France, and the budget connected with that treaty; and lastly, there has been what I must call the singular—I wish it may not prove the inflated—prosperity which for some time has attended the various manufactures and trades of this country, and which has absorbed men's minds, both employers and employed, and materially interfered with the expression of political opinion on any subject whatever. But I do not admit in the least any change in public opinion on this subject. I may appeal to many grounds as evidence for that opinion. One is, some of those petitions which I have had the honour of presenting this morning—one from the National Reform Conference held at Manchester, at which one hundred and fifty delegates from the principal towns of the kingdom were present, and another presented by my hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding (Sir Francis Crossley) from a similar Conference at Leeds. One petition I presented from the Working Men's Parliamentary Reform Association of Leeds, together with many others from my own town and county; and I know the feeling exists in favour of this measure to a very great extent. I am persuaded it would be found that it is not so much a change of opinion, as a diversion of attention for awhile; and so soon as circumstances arise to call for an expression of that opinion, you will find identically the same opinion that has been held and expressed before, rising up again; and if you choose to wait until a period of agitation, the people may present to you demands very different indeed from that which I now make on you in their behalf.

But if it be admitted to the fullest extent that the working classes have lately been indifferent to the franchise, there are various circumstances passing around us which show that it is morally impossible they should long continue thus indifferent. And I infer that moral impossibility from what is taking place perpetually in the exhibition of their tendencies and sympathies on the subject of popular freedom. Have not the people of England manifested sympathy on behalf of the liberties of the whole world? Have they not shown it on behalf of Italy, and have they not within these few days given an unparalleled reception to the great and heroic deliverer of Italy? Have they not manifested this sympathy on behalf of Hungary, and of Poland? And there is one fact which struck very much a distinguished foreigner from the other side of the Atlantic who visited this country, and that was, that when he went into the cotton districts of Lancashire he found a strong attachment to the cause of the Northern States and a strong detestation of slavery, and that the operatives were not to be induced, even by regard for their own temporary and immediate interests, to move in favour of an acknowledgment of the Confederate States, although told that such a step would lead to their getting a supply of the raw material for their labour. I consider that to be one of the most striking proofs I have ever heard of the deep attachment of the working classes of this country to right, to justice, and to liberty. I conceive it is totally impossible that those who value liberty so highly for others should be insensible to its value for themselves; and you may depend upon it the time will soon arrive, if it has not already arrived, when the people will demand as a right the possession of those franchises which have been so long withheld.

Once more, I would ask, do you think you are wise in deferring the concession of the claims of the working classes? I ask you to consider the spirit of the age, and to consider the changes which have occurred since the Reform Act of 1832 was passed. What have you seen in Europe since that period? You have seen representative institutions spread gradually over nearly the whole of Europe. You see them established in Austria, in Prussia, in Spain, in Portugal, in Italy, in Hanover, in Saxony, in Bavaria, in Denmark, and even in the Danubian Provinces; and in Australia and all our other colonies representative institutions have been formed. In many of those countries, too, a much more extensive franchise exists than exists in this country. Then I say this is an exhibition of the spirit of the age which a wise Legislature would do well not to neglect. But I do not need to go so far to find arguments in favour of the rights of the working classes. I have not to confine myself to the Friends whom I see around me, but I have to look to my Friends opposite, and to the Conservative aristocracy of England, for an amount of sympathy with the rights and interests of the working classes which I say will compel them, agreeably compel them, to concede the franchise which I now ask of them. We have had some very remarkable expressions of that opinion here. On the occasion of my hon. Friend's (Mr. Locke King's) Motion for the County Franchise Bill, the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Knightley) opposed the Bill on two main grounds, one of which was, that it did not recognize the rights of the labouring classes to some share of political power. His words were so remarkable that I must quote them. He said—

"The principles upon which, according to all the authorities, a measure of reform ought to be based, were, first, a more equal distribution of the representation in respect to property and population, and next, the recognition of the rights of the labouring classes to some share of political power."

He added—

"Hon. Gentlemen opposite, and many also on his side of the House, said, at the last General Election, that by their improved intelligence and increased respectability, the working classes were fairly entitled to some share of that political power from which they were excluded by the operation of the first Reform Bill. That might be perfectly true in regard to the boroughs."

Again, the hon. Gentleman maintained that the borough franchise was so high as quite to exclude the labouring classes from its enjoyment, and he said that even in the large borough of Birmingham, my hon. Friend who represents that borough

"did not represent one" of that class. I hope, therefore, I may confidently rely on the vote of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire to-day, as he has proved the two main points of my case—namely—1. That the labouring classes in the boroughs are excluded from the franchise; and 2. That this is one of the defects of our institutions most loudly calling for remedy. I find that I am trespassing upon the rules of the House in alluding to a former debate in the present Session, and, therefore, I will only ask hon. Members to bear in mind that there have been opinions expressed by a Gentleman so much respected and so candid as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate),—an opinion which goes, I will say, in favour of the consideration of the rights of the working classes, and of the question of Parliamentary reform. But there have been opinions expressed by many hon. Gentlemen opposite in which I so heartily agree that I hope I shall be justified in calling attention to them. They have been expressed, not this year, or last year, but several years ago, and they stand on record in a volume which we have often occasion to look to as a very authentic record of the views of hon. Members of this House—namely, Dodd's Parliamentary Companion. If I quote the opinions of two or three hon. Gentlemen opposite, it is in no invidious spirit; I do it with a most hearty concurrence in every word I quote, and only because I find in those speeches what I conceive to be liberal, and noble, and just sentiments, in which they have expressed my views better than I can find words to do. I find that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Du Cane) declares himself to be "in favour of extending the franchise to the industrious and intelligent portion of the working classes." The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Benyon) says, he is—

"Not opposed to the extension of the franchise to those who are well qualified by education and the increase of intelligence to exercise such a trust."

The hon. and learned Member for Belfast, who was Solicitor General under Lord Derby's Government (Sir Hugh Cairns), says, "he would not reduce the franchise in boroughs so low as £5." I hope, therefore, I may infer that he would reduce it to £6. The Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Copeland) is "in favour of a moderate extension of the suffrage coincident with education." So am I, and on the same principle. The right hon. Member for North Wilts, who was a Secretary of State under the Conservative Government (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt), is "in favour of a moderate extension of the franchise." The hon. Baronet the Member for Hertford (Sir Minto Farquhar) is said to be "in favour of admitting the working classes to a large share of the franchise." The hon. Baronet who represents Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) would "place the franchise within the reach of educated industry." The Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Finch) is "in favour of a larger extension of the suffrage than Lord Derby's Bill effected." The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Hensley), and the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), actually quitted the Government of Lord Derby because of his unsatisfactory reduction of the borough franchise; and the latter Gentleman was understood to favour a £6 rating franchise. The Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Hodgson) is "in favour of a £6 franchise, with some restrictions." The noble Viscount who represents West Kent (Lord Holmesdale) is "in favour of a sound practical measure of reform commensurate with the growing intelligence of the country." I could desire nothing better. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) is "in favour of the elective franchise being extended on principles which recognize education and intelligence." The hon. and learned Member for Chester (Mr. Humberston) is "in favour of the franchise being granted to a £5 rental in boroughs." The Member for Chippenham (Mr. R. Long) "will support any measure which would admit to the privileges of the franchise the steady, sober, and intelligent portion of the working classes." The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), also a distinguished Member of Lord Derby's Government, is "in favour of removing the anomalies from and moderately extending the franchise." The hon. and learned Member for Truro (Mr. Montague Smith) is—

"In favour of the franchise being extended to all those among the working classes who, by education and intelligence, and the moral training produced by habits of industry and thrift, are qualified to make choice of a representative."

The Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr.

Smollett) is "in favour of the extension of the suffrage, both in counties and boroughs." The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Somes) is "in favour of the franchise being lowered in boroughs." The right hon. Baronet who represents Lincolnshire (Sir John Trollope), who was President of the Poor Law Board under Lord Derby, is "in favour of lowering the franchise, especially in towns." And the gallant Member for West Sussex (Mr. Wyndham) is "in favour of extending the franchise to the intelligent portion of the working classes."

These are but a few out of no less than upwards of sixty Conservative Members of the House, who are recorded as having reform sympathies, and disposed to go a considerable way in that direction. The House will perceive that two points are distinctly admitted in the opinions which I have just read — namely, in the first place, that there has been an educational advance on the part of the people to qualify them for the franchise; and secondly, that such an educational advance entitles those classes to a participation in political privileges. I am relieved by the admissions I have quoted from the necessity of demonstrating the popular improvement by such a mass of evidence as I adduced on last bringing forward this Bill in the House. Some hon. Members may perhaps remember that I then laid before the House numerous facts drawn from official documents or trustworthy sources, to show the extraordinary advance which the people had made between the passing of the Reform Act and 1861, in education, in habits of reading, in political knowledge, in habits of association for mutual improvement and insurance, in temperance, in providence, and in attendance upon public worship. The results of the statistics on these points were in the highest degree gratifying. They showed that whilst the population had increased only 43 per cent within the thirty years, in many of those elements of intellectual and moral improvement which go to qualify for the franchise, there had been an advance of from 200 to 400 per cent. I believe a general impression prevails that those facts are indisputable; by the authorities I have just read they are substantially admitted on the other side of the House, and I will not, therefore, trouble you by reproducing those statistics. You will allow me, however, to bring before you two branches of evidence which are to my mind absolutely conclusive and irresistible on the subject. The first has reference to education, the second to our periodical and popular literature. I can well understand that a man who appreciates education as Earl Russell does would shrink in 1831 from proposing any great extension of the franchise to the working classes from the facts and statistics which were then before him on the subject of education. At that time there were no statistics of education later than those obtained by Lord Brougham's Commission in 1818; and indeed it was the children of 1818 who were the men of 1831, and had to exercise the franchise. What was the proportion, according to these statistics, of the educated among the population? The whole number of day scholars in England and Wales was only 674,883, and the proportion to population was one in seventeen. It is true that after the Reform Bill passed there was another Royal Commission, which showed that the proportion at that time had very much increased, and in the year 1833 it was ascertained that the number of scholars had increased to 1,276,947, being in the proportion of 1 to 11 of the population. In the year 1858 it was found by the last Royal Commission on Education that the scholars amounted to 2,535,462, bearing the proportion of one in 7·7 to the population. And we learn from the Census of 1861 that the number of scholars (including, however, those receiving private tuition) was then 3,150,048, being in the proportion of 1 in 6·4. This shows England to have become one of the best educated countries of the world. Between 1833 and 1861 the population of England and Wales increased only 40 per cent, but the increase of day scholars was 147 per cent. I most confidently present that fact as a ground which, whatever your (the Conservative) previous fears may have been on this subject, will justify you in granting the very moderate extension of the franchise for which I now ask.

But there is another branch of evidence which is still more important, and that is the amount of popular literature which is now distributed. There has been a marvellous spread of cheap literature, and the facts I shall lay before you will, I hope, induce those who were inclined to find a good deal of fault with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade, for advocating the repeal of the paper duty, to forgive those right hon. Gentlemen for the part they took in that question. For the facts I am about to state I am indebted mainly to Mr. John Francis, the publisher of the Athenæum, who has obtained the assistance of Messrs. Mitchell, publishers of the Newspaper Press Directory, and of the principal publishers of periodical and serial literature in London. The newspaper circulation is given for the United Kingdom—

This is only as to political information, but there has happily sprung up a vast amount of most useful and interesting literature in the shape of magazines, periodicals, and serials, the increase of which has been even more marvellous than the increase of the newspapers. I have got here the monthly Returns of the magazines and journals of a literary, scientific, and religious kind in London, and some of the principal cities. I will not trouble the House with all the details that have been furnished to me, but will select the leading points. I find that in London there are published monthly—

Can you compare this state of things with that which existed in 1831? The aggregate circulation of monthly magazines at that date, as estimated by those best qualified to judge, did not exceed 125,000, whereas now it is three millions. I believe the sale of weekly magazines would not then be more than 125,000. There were serials published, which I believe may be taken at something like 120,000; and I should be far beyond the mark if I say that at that time there were 400,000 monthly and weekly copies of literary periodicals issued. The number now is 6,094,950, or fifteen fold the number in 1830! I am sure this result will be regarded as most gratifying, and I believe there are few who could have anticipated the possibility of such a change from sweeping away the taxes on knowledge, and throwing open, I may say, the flood-gates of knowledge to the people.

As I thought it desirable that my case should not rest on facts drawn from London alone, I have asked the opinion of two gentlemen of the highest authority in two of the largest towns in England—Mr. Alderman Heywood, late Mayor of Manchester, and Mr. Guest, of Birmingham, both of them extensive publishers. I will first read the letter of Mr. Guest, which bears out, and more than bears out, the general evidence I have already offered. He says—

"I consider that every grade of the working classes is in a state of progression. Our Free Library has been opened with great and increasing success. The number of volumes issued during the past year was 357,436—daily average 436—and about 10,000 persons have visited the reading room every week. Building societies have increased in number and amount of business, proving that careful and provident habits are understood and practised. Sunday and other schools have progressed in the amount of usefulness. I have every reason to think that, in the last three years, the class in whose hands you wish to place the franchise—namely, the £8 householders—have materially increased in intelligence, and that they are fully entitled by their qualifications to the right to vote. The newspapers have made rapid strides. We have two dailies and four weeklies, circulating about 250,000 copies per week. Periodicals and other newspapers have by no means diminished in sale, but I am not in a condition to give you even an approximate number. There are about 300 families wholly or partially supported by the sale of the various publications, and they employ 1,000 persons at the least. This state of things, contrasted with the state of things up to Midsummer, 1830, when we had two local papers only, whose total circulation was not more than 6,000, and only three periodicals, at 2d. and 3d., for the whole country, is such, that a parallel can only be found in the extension of trade and travelling from railways, and letter-writing from cheap postage."

The next letter is from Mr. Alderman Heywood, the Mayor of Manchester, during last year—a year of the severest trial that any large community ever passed through, in consequence of the total prostration of the Cotton industry. He says—

"It is frequently asserted by Members of Parliament and by those who copy them, that the people care nothing for the right to vote, that they are apathetic, and want not the franchise."

He then accounts for their present quietness by their being wearied of political agitation, and of asking in vain for the franchise; and he says they have turned their attention to the co-operative societies as a means of improving their circumstances. He adds—

"But all these men are advocates for the right to vote, without any other qualification than that of enrolment. But it is amazing to see the progress they have made during the last twenty or twenty-five years. Whatever may be said to the contrary, there is a sturdy self-reliance being implanted in the people, which will exhibit itself whenever the right man in the right place is displayed before them. Great measures have been carried during years gone by, of immense value to the workman, such as the abolition of the bread tax, the uniform system of postage, and the entire abolition of the duty upon newspapers—measures which, had they been accompanied with a progressive admission upon the electoral lists, would have silenced political agitation for ever. Are the people fit for the exercise of political power? I thought they were in 1832, I am the more firmly convinced of it now. Since 1849, no political emeute or disturbance has taken place here or in the neighbourhood, nor would the bitterest foe to popular right find occasion to justify his resistance in the conduct and behaviour of the people. I need not refer to the example they have shown, the sufferings they have borne, during the last two years, as instances to prove how greatly the principles of law and order have become associated with their daily life. The newspaper is the idol of the working man. Every day unfolds to him new action, stirring events mixed up with the grave and the gay, imparting to him more extended sources of knowledge and pleasure, which, before the removal of the tax, he was incapable of attaining. I am pleased to find that you are intending to make another appeal to the wisdom and justice of that House, which all lovers of their country would desire to call the people's. You may depend upon one thing with certainty, that should the present Ministry be displaced and a Conservative one called to the helm of affairs, the apathy of the people will be no longer a reproach to them; on the contrary, a storm will be created of such intensity as will require a Reform Bill to subdue it."

These facts, I think, will justify the House in coming to the conclusion that there has been so vast, so satisfactory an extension of education and intelligence in the country as to warrant it in extending the franchise to those who are now excluded from political privileges. I may also remark, in passing, that the very class on which we seek to confer the franchise, is exactly that upon which almost all those influences to which I have referred are concentrated—namely, the better part of the working classes. It is not the idle, it is not the spendthrift, it is not the vagrant, it is not the people gratifying themselves with sensual indulgences; it is the steady, the sober, the industrious, and the provident portion of the working classes, who would gain the franchise. Can we doubt that men so improved in education and intelligence must be fit, not to sit in this House—I do not ask that, though I know many who would be—but to choose men who are fit? Can you doubt that they are that? Every grievance, every abuse swept away has been followed by an increase in the tranquillity and prosperity of the country. Reform has proved to be of all things the most Conservative. I believe the more you trust the people, the more you will find they deserve to be trusted. But, notwithstanding the confidence I feel in the people, I do not believe it is morally possible you should have an educated people, with a free press such as I have described, and the right of meeting, combined with a very restricted franchise. Some have said, if you reduce the franchise so as to include a portion of the working classes, you introduce a more dependent, and, therefore, a more corruptible set of men. From what I know of the upper part of the working classes, I believe it is utterly untrue. I believe they are a thinking, self-reliant, and independent body of men. Their social position is such that they really are not dependent to the extent some may imagine. The master is as much dependent on a good and skilful workman as the workman is dependent upon the master. If the workman should be turned off for giving a vote contrary to his conscience, the master becomes the scoff of the community. The workman takes his tools and goes to another master; so that there is really no ground whatever for maintaining that the working class—those who are educated, intelligent, and industrious—are a dependent class. I believe most firmly that amongst those who would be excluded if this Bill should pass, there are very many who are also well qualified to vote, but I propose a moderate measure; I go to that extent to which the Government of this country has gone, which the people of this country has sanctioned, and which you approved in this House in the year 1860, when you read the Bill containing this very franchise a second time, thereby affirming the principle of that Bill, and when no man durst rise and say, “No,” when the question was put. It remains for me now to state the effect which I believe the extension of the franchise to £6 occupiers would have in increasing the number of borough voters.

It may be remembered that when the same proposition was made by Lord Russell in 1860, he produced a Return, obtained by the Poor Law Board, which showed that the number of electors on the register for boroughs was then 443,208; and that the addition likely to be made by extending the franchise to £6 occupiers was 210,022, or 48 per cent. That would make a total of 653,230 electors. Four years having elapsed since that Return was obtained, and a new valuation of property having been made, I moved for a Return of the same purport last Session. I find, however, that the Returns asked for by the Poor Law Board have been only partially made, that is, by 77 boroughs, out of 200. But an estimate has been made, founded on the Returns actually received, and it has been made by a gentleman of large experience at the Poor Law Board, who prepared the Return of 1860. The general result is nearly the same. The number of borough voters on the register for 1863 has increased to 487,604, and the number estimated as likely to be added by extending the franchise to £6 occupiers is 240,705, being 49 per cent on the existing number. That I think a very moderate increase. The whole number of male occupiers between £6 and £10 rental is, indeed, considerably larger, namely, 383,901. But it is well known that a large proportion even of the occupiers of £10 and upwards fail, from a variety of causes, to get upon the register. The proportion which thus fail is 27·3 per cent; and it is reasonably supposed, by the experienced official gentleman who has made the calculation, that 10 per cent more of the lower class of voters, namely, 37·3 per cent, would fail to be registered as voters. Making this deduction, the net addition to the voters would be, as I have said, 240,705. Adding the new and old voters together, the whole number of borough voters would be 728,309. I find that the number of males above twenty years of age in the represented boroughs is 2,268,169. At present, therefore, only one in five of the male adult population of the boroughs has a vote; and the measure which I submit would increase the voters to about one in three of the male adults. Two-thirds of the population, however, or 1,539,860, out of 2,268,169, would still remain without the franchise;—an extent of exclusion which surely may satisfy the most timid Conservative. But I must be allowed to say that, unless Parliament should make some additional enactment to carry out its own clear intention, manifested in the two Acts of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14 & 39, to prevent tenants from losing their votes in consequence of their landlords compounding for the rates, the number of voters added by the present Bill would be nearly 100,000 less than I have stated. I rely, however, on the determination of the House not to suffer its intentions on behalf of the humbler class to be frustrated.

I now come to the last point, and that is, the proportion of the working classes who will be admitted to the franchise by this measure. The proportion which the working class voters would bear to the middle and upper classes in boroughs, if the measure I ask you to grant be adopted, would, I believe, be between one in four and one in three. It is known that the upper and middle classes are only one-fourth of the population, while the working classes are three-fourths. The upper and middle classes, with only one-fourth of the population, would still constitute two-thirds of the number of voters in boroughs. But it must be remembered that in the counties the working classes have no appreciable weight whatever. I know my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire says he has a number of working class constituents. That is true, and there are also some in the West Riding and other counties; but they are so few that I may say the working class have no appreciable representation, and that the whole of the county constituencies are in the hands of the landed interest—I might say the landed aristocracy. You have therefore to add the county voters to the borough voters of the upper and middle classes; and then it would leave the working classes, even with the extension I have asked you to grant, with a proportion of only about one-fifth or one-sixth of the whole number of electors in England and Wales.

I think, then, Sir, I may appeal to the House that this is a moderate and safe measure. I believe most confidently that it will conduce to the concord of the people of this land and to the stability of our institutions. I believe it would redeem the honour of Government and Parliament, which is in great danger of being sacrificed by the non-carrying out of the pledges entered into at the last General Election.

If you should introduce a considerable number of the sons of industry to the political franchise, I am confident that you would find them to be the truest defenders of the Throne and of the Constitution—a great accession to your strength in war and your prosperity in peace. We might then, in the language of a prophet of old, foretelling to an ancient people a period of enlargement and prosperity, bid constitutional England “lengthen her cords and strengthen her stakes.”

MR. BAZLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. CAVE*: Sir, in moving the Previous Question, I shall not attempt to follow the hon. Member for Leeds through a mass of statistics and figures, which cannot be checked in debate, and which he has adduced apparently for the purpose of proving that the change he proposes is really no change at all. It is enough to say that it has been made quite clear on former occasions, that in almost every borough in England the addition he would make would be quite enough to turn the scale. I shall now endeavour to show that if, as the House decided by a large majority in 1861, the time the hon. Member then chose for his Motion was not a convenient one, the present cannot be considered more happy. I shall try to prove this from the arguments brought forward then, and reiterated now by the hon. Gentleman, as well as by suggesting that the reasons which I then adduced have, if anything, gathered strength in the interval. It was objected before, and probably may be again, that my Motion ought to be for the rejection of the Bill altogether; but, though the effect would undoubtedly be the same, I have chosen this form as evincing no hostility to the hon. Member's doctrine, that the working classes ought to have a share in the representation.

A very able professor, whose talents I admire, and whose misfortune I deplore, Mr. Fawcett, said the other day in a lecture on Reform, in Manchester, that “he hated the phrase that the working men ought not to have the franchise because they had no stake in the country.” Now, I should not like to endorse all the learned Gentleman's views, but I entirely concur in this; and therefore I feel disposed to ask the House to agree with me in postponing the consideration of the amount of that share which the working man has, and that which he should have, to a more convenient season, rather than to move the direct negative, since my motives in doing this would certainly be misrepresented by those whose interest it is to give themselves out as friends of the working man. I say the share which he has, for has not a great change taken place since 1832? In these thirty years has there not been a vast alteration in the material condition of the working classes? The £6 and £10 houses of that day bear a very different value now. We know that house rent has doubled and trebled in large towns, and the wages of skilled labour risen in proportion, so that if, as the hon. Member avers, education and intelligence have reached a lower social stratum, then, I answer, that these changes to which I have referred have already raised the best of that stratum to a higher political position. The Committees under the new Assessment Act have told us that the question of valuation is now entirely unsettled, and the general impression appears to be that the majority of houses of this description are even now valued far too low. Therefore the changing value of property is effecting a reform in the direction aimed at by the hon. Member, silently, and gradually, and safely to the nation, though I can well imagine that this may not be satisfactory to those who prefer a violent change with a flourish of trumpets, and would sacrifice anything for a little fleeting popularity. I hope the hon. Member will understand that I make these remarks generally, and am far from supposing them to apply personally to himself, as I believe his character to be entirely above such imputations.

And now I will proceed to examine those arguments of the hon. Member in his former Motion on this subject, which were based upon his conjectures of what might happen in future. I need hardly say that prophecy is very dangerous, unless the prophet's predictions are so vague, that, like the oracles of old, they may be read in more ways than one. But the hon. Member was, if I might presume to say so, almost rashly precise. He said that the spring of the year 1861 was the proper time for deciding this question; and why? Because "We had had one bad harvest, and were threatened with a second. Recent events across the Atlantic had raised doubts as to the supply of our most important raw material. The nations of Europe were bristling with arms. It was possible that a time of trial awaited us from domestic distress and foreign danger. Should it be so, where would be our security but in a people satisfied with their institutions?"

I beg the attention of the House to that expression. We have been much worse off than the hon. Member even imagined we might be. Not only was his anticipation of a bad harvest in 1861 realized, but we had another in 1862. Not only were there doubts as to our supply of cotton, but it was almost wholly cut off, and the industry of the northern counties received a blow unparalleled in their history. For some weeks of the very year in which the hon. Member made that speech, we did not know whether we were not at war with the United States; and what was the conduct of the working classes of England? Did we hear of a repetition of the Reform riots of Nottingham and Bristol? ["Opposition cheers."] I understand those cheers, and will answer them immediately. Was there any evidence of bitterness against the wealthier classes, or any disposition to take advantage of the calamities and dangers of the country? Was there not, on the contrary, an universal outburst of loyalty on the mere rumour of war? and did not the nation work together, high and low, north and south, east and west, to tide the factory operatives over the cotton crisis, as if, instead of the hard strata of unsympathizing castes, as hon. Gentlemen opposite sometimes are pleased to represent us, we were members of one family, with a common object and common interests? I ask whether the conduct of the people of England during these twenty-four months of the severest trial we have ever known, was not that of a "people satisfied with their institutions?" The hon. Member is entitled, no doubt, to use this most admirable behaviour in support of his present Motion; but I appeal to the House, against the ironical cheers of hon. Gentlemen opposite, whether I have not at least an equal right to employ it in demolishing his former position? The hon. Member for Birmingham also took up his parable, and said a little earlier that if the Bill of 1860 did not pass there would be delegates from every Trades' Union in the country sitting in London. That shows by the way, the hon. Member's idea of the independent exercise of the franchise by the working man. Well, the Bill of 1860 did not pass, and in 1862

there were delegates, if not from all the Trades' Unions, certainly from all the trades in the country, assembled in London, and for what purpose? Not for a barren agitation in which the best working men take no real interest, though some of their leaders make a profitable trade of it, but for the real, tangible, sensible, and legitimate object of improving their taste and skill in workmanship, and so attaining that material prosperity which quickly enables the intelligent and industrious to cross the almost imaginary barrier of disfranchisement whenever they care to do so. But are there no signs of discontent now? Why, we have had mass meetings and indignation meetings within the last few days, and with what object? The mass meetings were to plant trees in memory of Shakespeare; the indignation meetings had no greater grievance to decry against than the premature departure of an illustrious stranger.

In listening to the speeches of some hon. Members, one would suppose that we live in a political state resembling that of France before the first Revolution, when there was a barrier against which talent, industry, and ambition surged in vain on one side, while pride, indolence, and luxury looked carelessly on the other; and yet even while they are speaking hundreds upon hundreds of the working classes rise with ease to competence and the franchise; while the commanding intellects among them, who formerly led the masses against the ranks above, now simply come forth from the crowd, obtain affluence and position, and not only votes but seats in this House, and may aspire, without either presumption or despair, to the highest offices. And as, in a well-ventilated room, when the heated air rises the cold falls in constant circulation, so in this free country there is a perpetual recruiting of the higher ranks from the lower, and sinking of the higher into the lower again, until, as was once observed, it is difficult to decide whether we have the most democratic aristocracy or the most aristocratic democracy in the world. Surely it is far better that men should rise to the franchise than that the franchise should be lowered to them. Surely those who have so risen ought to be the last to advocate the indiscriminate scattering of the privileges they have worked for; and I believe, as a matter of fact, the great body of £10 householders have no wish to be swamped by a vast influx of the ranks below them. Indeed, it stands to reason that a transfer of power to the masses, as masses, by mere lowering of the franchise must be dangerous, because those classes which work from morning till evening have, to use the words of the Member for Birmingham, "Limited means of informing themselves on these great subjects." They are, therefore, at the mercy of mere declaimers, who bow the hearts of great masses as one man by the force of rhetoric alone, as an eloquent counsel excites the sympathy of his audience without the least reference to the justice of his cause. There are times of great excitement when masses of people cannot be induced to hear reason, and therefore the transfer of power to those who naturally and habitually act in masses is dangerous, even without question of the intelligence and education of the component parts of the mass. I have seen, at least on one occasion, even this House act very like an infuriated mob. [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear!] Yes—but perhaps the best illustration of what I mean is afforded by a scene in which the Member for Birmingham himself took a part in 1857, when not even his powerful voice, and readiness of speech, and former popularity could gain him a hearing from a body of people, scarcely one of whom perhaps knew the real objects of the war for which they were so enthusiastic, and, if he had known them, would probably not have given a day's wages or an hour's thought on their behalf.

A publication of Liberal views (The Scotsman) recently observed how little reality there is in the confidence so loudly expressed by certain people in the working classes, concluding with these words—

"The same agitators who would control by law the working man in meats and drinks are mainly the same people who affect a desire to hand over to him the power of making laws for all other people. They cry out that the working man cannot be trusted to take care of himself, and also that he ought to be intrusted with the care of everybody else. They make him socially a slave and politically a despot. They govern him as a child in his own affairs, and would make him governor over men in the affairs of the nation. They must be wrong on one point or the other. Our view is that they are wrong on both, that the working men are neither unfit to be socially free, nor fit to be politically omnipotent."

The working men are, like other people, good, bad, and indifferent; but, like all others, who from circumstances live much in common, are apt to be led by the worst among their number. The true, honest, industrious workmen—the men who are respected by their employers—are rarely much of politicians, and seldom have the “gift of the gab;” yet in times of excitement, as we have already seen, they too often lack courage to assert their independence, and surrender their will to unscrupulous agitators, just as in American elections the majorities, or “self-styled” majorities, to use a classical expression, exercise a complete tyranny over the rest of the community, and drive them like sheep to the poll. Why, it was only the other day that a newly-made corporation elected as their chief magistrate a man who had been twice convicted of using false weights before the very bench on which he is now to sit; and we know that the £6 element pretty nearly controls municipal elections. These amongst us who remember our own school days, and how often we followed the multitude against our better judgment, will know what I mean, and will make every allowance for these men, but will not be disposed to hand over a preponderance of power to them. I am not now talking of working men pressing their own interests against those of other classes, but of their sending here as their representatives strike-leaders, and such like, when there are Members on both sides of this House whom individually they would consult on any emergency fifty times rather than their ostensible leaders, at whose chariot-wheels they are unresistingly dragged. But, supposing they do understand and work their own interests, then they must not be allowed to over-balance the rest. I would not trust any interest with overwhelming power; and it is the excellence of our Constitution that one interest checks another, and all are kept within proper bounds. Exciting questions may arise, in which the value of such checks may be appreciated. There has been some vague talk, some very vague talk, about land. I imagine the clients of certain hon. Members do not confine their views to a Land Transfer Bill, which will probably increase the purchase price; but this is certain, that land becomes more and more of a luxury every year, and less within the reach of the working classes, and when such questions are started, it will not do to have all the property on one side and all the power on the other.

I remember many years ago having the advantage of an acquaintance in Boston,

in the United States, with the late Mr. Abbott Lawrence, who was afterwards American Minister at this Court. At a party in his house the repudiation of the State debts was being discussed, and compared, as Americans were fond of doing, to the suspension of cash payments by the Bank of England. When the company had gone, their host remarked to me—

“After all that has been said, it was a very disgraceful thing; but, if your cabmen in London were told that if the National Debt was wiped out they would get beer at half-price, don't you think they would vote for it? Because that is our case; those are the people who govern us here.”

I believe our cabmen have much improved since those days, and, perhaps, the American statesman might have done them an injustice even then; but I was much struck with his words, and still more when he went on to say—

“England seems hurrying towards universal suffrage. Ah! if she had only our experience; but she seems judicially blinded.”

The hon. Member for Norwich (Mr. Warner), in an able pamphlet, has explained this danger, and proposed a certain number of mouth-pieces for working men, in the shape of delegates from their own body, representing extra seats in large towns. Whether the Sussex labourer would think the Manchester artizan a better representative of his interests than his own landlord or neighbour I question.

In Sweden, the peasantry have a House of Parliament to themselves, as have the nobles, the clergy, and the burghers. These four Chambers must concur on all legislative measures, but the system works badly, and naturally, therefore, throws more power into the hands of the Executive, the result being that the Parliament meets only once in three years, the Government doing pretty much as they like in the interval. I must say I have no great faith in symmetrical Constitutions. I prefer that which works fairly to that which ought to work perfectly. England should remember the epitaph on a tombstone, “I was well; I wanted to be better; and here I am.” A Prussian once said to me—

“I cannot understand your English Constitution—it is full of the most absurd anomalies, but everything seems to turn out right; while in Prussia we have a perfect Constitution, but we are always in trouble, everything seems to go wrong.”

But these anomalies are not all in one direction; a double first-class man or Senior Wrangler, who objects to pay for commons he does not eat, and sermons he does not sleep under, and has, therefore, taken his name off the books, is called to the bar, or has the cure of two or three thousand souls, and if he lives in furnished lodgings—a very common case—has no more vote than a pauper. The same is the case with officers in the army and navy, and many others; so that the £6 franchise by no means produces the symmetry so much desired. Do these people consider themselves unrepresented? I did not when I was one of them, and I believe the working classes are fully represented in this House as far as their material welfare is concerned. Has not the tendency been to relieve them of taxation? To give merely one instance of a trifling character, but of very recent occurrence. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed in his budget to remit a portion of the duty on the licences to sell tea in places outside Parliamentary boroughs. I took the liberty of stating to the right hon. Gentleman grounds, which he considered sufficient, for extending the boon to people within those limits. And to whom has this concession been made? To those who, by means of their votes, could exercise pressure upon the Government or their representatives? No; it is confined to occupants of £8 houses. The Chancellor, by-the-by, may be said to have made his concession in anticipation of his Motion, but I, at least, cannot be accused of any arrière pensée of that kind. Whenever there is a genuine feeling in the great body of the English people that they want something, they generally get it, and in such cases they have almost always a good reason for the demand. What is the general feeling now—a feeling which is not very likely to be weakened by the state of surrounding nations? Why, that peace, and equal laws, and security of life and property, are things worth having; not an artificial symmetrical Constitution which is always coming to a dead-lock, as in Prussia—not extended suffrage, ending in despotism, as in France—not extended suffrage, tending to anarchy, as in America. The people do not consider a vote a good thing in itself, and they do not want it as an engine to bring about great changes, as was the case in 1832. Four times within a very brief period (without reckoning minor measures) have Reform Bills been introduced by the Government of the day, and four times abandoned, without exciting more feeling in the country than so many Railway or Canal Bills.

In 1861, the hon. Member for Leeds introduced his present measure, which was defeated, without much remark out of doors. Very strong speeches were undoubtedly made in its favour within these walls by two hon. Members opposite. They seem, however, to have modified their views; for one of them, the hon. Member for Huddersfield, on a late occasion called the present proposal a single-barrelled Reform Bill, meaning, I presume, by this disparaging description, that it is an antiquated weapon, not adapted to the wants or habits of the present day; and the other, the hon. Member for Halifax, who denounced the Government for their coolness on the subject of Reform, became afterwards a member of that Government, judging—and I think wisely judging—that more good was to be done by applying his time and talents in limiting the expenses of Government establishments than in ventilating speculative questions. The few petitions presented in favour of Reform, when not mere copies of one model, vary most materially in the very principle of the measures they demand. In 1861, I ventured to suggest that certain objects seemed to belong to certain periods, and that our whole attention was then concentrated on foreign affairs. I instanced the unsettled state of Austria and Italy, and I said that

“Seeds of discord were being sown in Hungary and Poland, that Prussia was threatening Denmark and France threatening Europe.”

Will the House say that this argument has not gained force by the lapse of these three years? And will any one assert that, when the Conference is sitting within a few yards of this House, with peace and war depending on its breath, and has been more than once, as we understand, on the point of breaking off at the very threshold of its deliberations—when the Channel Fleet is riding in the Downs, with fires banked up, anchors short stay apeak, and—as the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty told us the other night in the most significant manner—ready to sail anywhere in twenty-four hours—will any one assert that this is the time to plunge the country into the troubled waters of domestic revolution? The true policy is not to meddle with our institutions except in an emergency which renders it absolutely necessary, and then to do our work in such a manner as to settle the question, at least for our day. If, therefore, the country does not feel that the present is the time for even a comprehensive, well-considered measure, brought in by the Government with the solemnity befitting the occasion, still less favourably does it feel towards this bit-by-bit reform, this pecking at our institutions, this instalment, as we have heard it called; but it is the kind of instalment which one of the ingredients of a physician's prescription would be without the rest. The whole may be a salutary remedy, part alone may be fatal. If there is to be a more numerous constituency, care must be taken so to balance the new proportions as to gratify a desire for enfranchisement without destroying the present Constitution, which works so well. That man must have attended the House of Commons to very little purpose who is not convinced that every interest—I care not whether landed, mercantile, shipping, railway, or any other—would be disposed to use preponderating influence for its own advantage. I cannot suppose that the working classes would be more abstinent; therefore I fear that what the hon. Member calls moderate Reform may turn out to be a dangerous revolution. If my fears are groundless, and if the hon. Member's own estimate be more accurate, then it is merely throwing a tub to a whale, and will be simply the prelude to more sweeping changes. In either case, Sir, I venture to repeat that a far more comprehensive, more deeply considered measure is requisite for the attainment of the hon. Member's object, without grave peril to the common weal; and as I believe that the House and the country are indisposed just now, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to state, to enter upon so intricate and difficult a task, I venture humbly to move that the present is not the time for putting this Question. The hon. Member concluded by moving, as an Amendment, the Previous Question.

MR. MARSH had much pleasure in seconding the Amendment. Nobody seemed to want reform. There were no public meetings in favour of this measure, and it seemed to him that nobody outside wanted it. It was a measure more sought for in the House of Commons than anywhere else; and he confessed he did not know why that should be, because he, for one, thought he had constituents enough. It had been said that the time when the people did not ask for reform was the best time to carry it; but he did not agree in that doctrine. If they looked to the history of the world, they would find that all great political and social reforms had proceeded from the people; and the monarchs and aristocracies who had attempted to lead the people in those directions had not been the luckiest. A great deal had been said about the working man not being represented in the House of Commons. He had analyzed his own constituency, and he found that a very large number of the people who occupied £10 houses either had been mechanics or were at the present moment living by the work of their hands. The people who lived in the great squares of London were virtually unrepresented, while the publican at the corner who had his rooms engaged as committee-rooms at an extravagant charge very likely had scores or hundreds of votes at his command. The same was the case in the Tower Hamlets—all those who owned the great docks and warehouses there were virtually unrepresented. No one could complain that the interests of the working classes were not well looked after. There was always a cheer when anything was said in their favour in the House, and sometimes Bills were passed in utter defiance of all principles of political economy for their supposed benefit. If any one wanted to encourage bribery and corruption, he had but to support the lowering of the franchise. In all the boroughs which had obtained notoriety on this score, it was the freemen, and not the £10 householders, who formed the bribed classes. For these reasons he seconded the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER*: I must begin, Sir, by observing, that the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cave), in my opinion, went far beyond the scope of the Motion which he has submitted to the House. For it was really a speech against all extension of the franchise in the direction of the working classes, and it did not refer merely to the subject of that particular franchise, which we have to adopt or reject in connection with the present Bill. However, it may be said with truth, that it is not the speech in question, but the Motion of my hon. Friend on the one side, and the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite on the other, with which we have principally to deal. Let us, then, consider what is the practical issue raised for our present decision.

There are two points bearing upon this question, the one a matter of fact, and the other a matter of judgment, upon which it may be reasonably supposed there will be a general concurrence of opinion. With regard to the matter of fact, there is no doubt that those who sit on the other side may be said to be unanimous in deprecating at the present time—and certainly, as far as the argument of the hon. Gentleman, and the reception of that argument, afforded an indication, at any time—the extension of the franchise. I do not attempt to conceal or deny, on the other hand, that the other great party in the country is not unanimous on the subject. No small number of those, who profess liberal opinions, are indifferent, some may be even averse, to any change such as is proposed by the Bill, from a £10 to a £6 franchise in towns. The second point, upon which I think all parties are agreed, is this—that at the present period, and in a state of opinion such as now subsists, it would not be advisable, I might even say it would not be justifiable, for the Government of the Queen, however it might be composed, to submit a measure on this subject to Parliament. Under these circumstances, and with these admissions freely made, the question we have before us for to-day is this—What course ought we to take on the Motion of my hon. Friend, having regard to the Amendment which has been moved in favour of postponement? My hon. Friend, without communication with the Government, and acting, as far as I am aware, entirely in the exercise of his own discretion, has brought his proposal before us as a subject for discussion. I treat this, without praise or censure, merely as a fact. And now, I admit, it may be said that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite, which is a Motion for time, does, in fact, no more than embody the admissions I have myself made—namely, that this is not a period for a Government to deal with this question, and that even the party which represents the liberal opinions of the country is not unanimous on the subject. Why, then, do I vote against the hon. Gentleman's Motion? It is because, even when taken apart from his speech, although much more if taken in connection with the speech, it appears to me to support, to justify, and to confirm a state of facts and opinions, which I deeply deprecate and deplore. Admitting the existence of those opinions within the limits I have described—and it is useless to shut our eyes to their existence—I must say that I deeply deplore them. I will not go the whole length of my hon. Friend in respect to the precise terms he used as to the broken pledges of Governments and parties, but I will not scruple to admit that, at least as it appears to me, so much of our Parliamentary history during the last thirteen years—I mean during the years since the vote on Mr. Locke King's Bill in 1851—as touches Parliamentary Reform, is a most unsatisfactory chapter in that history; and has added nothing to the honour of Parliament, or to the safety and well-being of the country. Now I cannot expect any sudden change for the better as likely to arise from any debate or decision on the present Bill. Yet I am convinced that the discussion of the question in the House of Commons must, through the gentle process by which Parliamentary debates act on the public mind, gradually help to bring home the conviction that we have not been so keenly alive to our duties in this matter as we ought to have been; that it is for the interests of the country that this matter should be entertained; and that it ought, if we are wise, to be brought to an early settlement. The conditions requisite for dealing with it can only be supplied by a favourable state of the public mind; but the public mind is itself guided, and opinion modified, in no small degree, by the debates of Parliament.

One especial advantage attends to-day the discussion of this question, that, at present, at all events, it is not to be held strictly a party question. I am afraid, indeed, if I take as a criterion the cheers with which the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite was received, and the quarter from which they proceeded, that the time may come when this may, and will, once more become a party question. For the present, however, we may discuss it without exclusive reference to party associations; and I may take the opportunity of saying that for this reason I am glad—though for others I am not so—that my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury has stepped into the arena on this occasion; because the circumstance enables us the more easily to find our way into the discussion of the question without the apprehension that we are irritating and exciting those passions and party sentiments, which necessarily enter into our debates when party interests are concerned, and which might help to obscure the true merits of the case. I will address myself, then, to the question actually before us, admitting again that if I deeply deplore the state of opinion opposite, I am far from being satisfied with the state of opinion on this side of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury appears to think that he has made out his case when he has advanced three propositions: one of them, that nobody desires, nobody petitions for, the Bill; the next, that to propose the extension of the franchise downwards is to propose also the encouragement of bribery; and the third, that the working classes have their interests well attended to by the House of Commons as it is at present constituted. Now, Sir, I decline altogether to follow my hon. Friend into an argument upon the question whether or not the extension of the franchise downwards would really lead to the encouragement of bribery. I would simply record my emphatic dissent from that statement. Again, with respect to the allegation that the working classes have their interests well cared for by this House, far be it from me to deny that this House has a strong feeling of sympathy with the working classes; but permit me to say that that sympathy is not the least strongly felt, and that its practical exhibition has certainly not been least remarkable, among those also who are the immediate promoters and supporters of this Bill. And next I come to the assertion that nobody desires a measure of this sort. But before otherwise dealing with this assertion, I want to know where, in a discussion such as is now before us, lies the burden of proof? Is the onus probandi upon those who maintained that the present state of the representation ought not to be touched, or upon those who say it ought to be amended? The hon. Member for Shoreham says the case of the British Constitution, after a Bill of this sort, will be like the case of the man over whom was written the epitaph, "I was well; I would be better; here I am;" and he told us again that to venture on a change such as is presented in this Bill was to enter on a "domestic revolution." Sir, I entirely deprecate the application of language of such a kind to the present Bill. I will not now enter into the question whether the precise form of franchise, and the precise figure, which my hon. Friend has indicated, may or may not be that which, upon full deliberation, we ought to choose; I will not now inquire whether the franchise should be founded on rate-paying or on occupation; neither will I consider whether or not there should be a lodger's franchise; I put aside every question except the very simple one which I take to be at issue, and on this I will endeavour not to be misunderstood. I apprehend my hon. Friend's Bill to mean (and if such be the meaning I give my cordial concurrence to the proposition), that there ought to be, not a wholesale, nor an excessive, but a sensible and considerable addition to that portion of the working classes—at present almost infinitesimal—which is in possession of the franchise. Now, Sir, if I am asked what I mean by a "sensible and considerable addition," I reply that I mean such an addition as I think, and as we at the time contended in argument [see 3 Hansard, clviii. 461] would have been made by the Bill which the present Government submitted to the House in 1860. Does then the onus of proof that there is a necessity for such a measure lie with us? Has the hon. Member wholly forgotten, or does he set wholly at naught, all the formal and solemn declarations of the years from 1851 to 1860? What, again, is the present state of the constituency, any departure from which the hon. Gentleman deprecates and stigmatises as a "domestic revolution?" At present we have, speaking generally, a constituency of which between one-tenth and one-twentieth—certainly less than one-tenth—consists of working men. And what proportion does that fraction of the working classes, who are in possession of the franchise, bear to the whole body of the working classes? I apprehend I am correct in saying that those who possess the franchise are less than one-fiftieth of the whole number of the working classes. Is that a state of things which we cannot venture to touch or modify? Is there no choice between excluding forty-nine out of every fifty working men on the one hand, and on the other a "domestic revolution?" I contend, then, that it is on the hon. Gentleman that the burden of proof must be held principally to lie; that it is on those who say it is necessary to exclude forty-nine-fiftieths that the burden of proof rests; that it is for them to show the unworthiness, the incapacity, and the misconduct of the working classes, in order to make good their argument that no larger portion of them than this should be admitted to the suffrage. ["Oh, oh!"] I am sorry to find that it is anywhere thought necessary to treat this question by what, perhaps, to use a mild phrase, I may call "inarticulate reasoning;" and I will endeavour not to provoke more of it from a certain quarter of the House than I can help. But it is an opinion which I entertain, that if forty-nine-fiftieths of the working classes are to be excluded from the franchise, it is certainly with those who maintain that exclusion that it rests to show its necessity. On the other hand, my hon. Friend indicates that kind of extension of the suffrage which would make the working classes a sensible fraction of the borough constituency; an important fraction, but still a decided minority as compared with the other portion of it. That is the proposition which we have before us for our present consideration.

We are told that the working classes do not agitate for an extension of the franchise; but is it desirable that we should wait until they do agitate? In my opinion, agitation by the working classes, upon any political subject whatever, is a thing not to be waited for, not to be made a condition previous to any Parliamentary movement; but, on the contrary, it is a thing to be deprecated, and, if possible, anticipated and prevented by wise and provident measures. An agitation by the working classes is not like an agitation by the classes above them, the classes possessed of leisure. The agitation of the classes having leisure is easily conducted. It is not with them that every hour of time has a money value; their wives and children are not dependent on the strictly reckoned results of those hours of labour. When a working man finds himself in such a condition that he must abandon that daily labour on which he is strictly dependent for his daily bread, when he gives up the profitable application of his time, it is then that, in railway language, "the danger signal is turned on;" for he does it only because he feels a strong necessity for action, and a distrust in the rulers who, as he thinks, have driven him to that necessity. The present state of things, I rejoice to say, does not indicate that distrust; but if we admit this as matter of fact, we must not along with the admission allege the absence of agitation on the part of the working classes as a sufficient reason why the Parliament of England, and the public mind of England, should be indisposed to entertain the discussion of this question. I may presume, Sir, to mention that I happen to have had a recent opportunity of obtaining some information respecting the views of the working classes on this subject. It arose incidentally; but I thought it worth attention at the time, and I still think it may be worth the attention of the House. It was in connection with the discussions on the Government Annuities Bill, when a deputation, representing the most extensive among all the existing combinations of the working classes of Liverpool, came to me, and expressed their own sentiments and those of their fellows with respect to that Bill. [Mr. HOBSFALL: It was not a deputation from Liverpool, but from London.] I am not aware of having said Liverpool. ["Yes, yes."] I beg pardon, then, I meant London; and I thank my hon. Friend for the correction he has supplied, as it enables me to report the views of a body of men perhaps some six or eight times larger than any corresponding body in Liverpool. After disavowing opposition to that measure, they proceeded to hold language such as this: "If there has been any suspicion or disinclination to this Bill on the part of the working classes, it is owing in a great measure to their dissatisfaction with the conduct of Parliament during recent years in reference to the extension of the suffrage." Part of my answer to them was, "If you complain of the conduct of Parliament, depend upon it the conduct of Parliament has been connected in no small degree with the apparent inaction, and alleged indifference, of the working classes themselves with respect to the suffrage." The reply which they then returned was one which made a deep impression on my mind. They used language to the following effect: "It is true that, since the abolition of the Corn Laws, we have given up political agitation; we have begun from that time to feel that we might place confidence in Parliament; that we might look to Parliament to pass beneficial measures without agitation. We were told then to abandon those habits of political action which had so much interfered with the ordinary occupations of our lives; and we have endeavoured to substitute for them the employment of our evenings in the improvement of our minds." I do not hesitate to confess that I was greatly struck by that answer. And, after hearing it, I, for one, am more than ever unable to turn round on the working classes and say, that it is plain they do not care for the extension of the franchise, because they do not agitate in order to obtain it. The objection made by the hon. Gentleman opposite and by many others is, that the working classes, if admitted even in limited numbers, or at all events so as to form any considerable proportion of a constituency, will go together as a class, and wholly separate themselves from other classes. I do not wish to use harsh language, and therefore I will not say that that is a libel; but I believe it to be a statement altogether unjustified by reference to facts. It is not a fact, as I believe, that the working men, who are now invested with the franchise, act together as a class; and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that they would so act together if there were a moderate and fair extension of the suffrage. If, indeed, we were to adopt a sudden and sweeping measure, a measure which might deserve the epithet of revolutionary; if we were to do anything which would give a monopoly of power to the working classes; if, for example, instead of adopting a measure which would raise the proportion of working men in the town constituencies to one-third, you gave the franchise to two-thirds, there would be some colour for the anticipation, and some justification for the language so lightly used; there might then be some temptation to set up class interests on the part of those who might thus have the means of obtaining, or, at least, a temptation to grasp at a monopoly of power, and it would, under these circumstances, be for us to show, if we could, that no danger would arise. But I appeal to the evidence of all, who know anything of the facts, to say whether we have not seen the working classes, in places where they possessed the franchise, instead of being disposed to go together as a class, rather inclined, as a general rule, and under all ordinary circumstances, to follow their superiors, to confide in them, to trust them, and to hold them in high esteem. Their landlords in the country, their employers in the town, their neighbours, and those whose personal characters they respect—these are the men whom the working classes commonly elect to follow; and for my part, I believe, if there is anything which will induce them to alter their conduct, and to make it their rule to band together as a class, it will be resentment at exclusion, and a sense of injustice. Whatever tends to denote them as persons open to the influence of bribery—as persons whose admission within the pale of the constitution constitutes “a domestic revolution;” whatever tends to mark them as unworthy of confidence and respect, is calculated to drive them back to the use of their natural means of self-defence, and might, possibly, in times and circumstances which we can conceive, become the motive cause of an union among the working classes, which would be adverse to other classes of the community.

It would, Sir, be worse than idle, after the able and luminous speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Baines), to detain the House with the statistics of the question. But I take my stand, in the first place, on a great legislative fact; on the Reform Bill of 1832. Before 1832—the epoch of the Reform Act—although the working classes were not supposed to be represented in this House, yet we had among the constituencies some of an important character which were in an entirely preponderating proportion working class constituencies. I myself was elected by a scot and lot borough, the borough of Newark. At the time that I was first returned for that borough, in December, 1832, the constituency was close upon 1,600. That same constituency is now a little more than 700; nor has it yet, I believe, reached its minimum; in fact, it is in progress of regular decay, until it reaches the limit fixed by the number of £10 houses. That borough was enfranchised in the time of Charles II., when the Crown did not fear to issue writs calling for the return, in certain cases, of Members by constituencies that consisted of all inhabitants who paid scot and lot. But since the Act of 1832, there has been a large deduction made from the number of working men in the possession of the franchise by the changes which have taken place in the condition of the boroughs called pot-walloping boroughs, scot and lot boroughs, and by other denominations. I greatly doubt whether, even after making fair allowance for the bettered circumstances of working men, as large a proportion of the entire body hold the suffrage now as held it in December, 1832. If that is so, is it fair and proper that, in the thirty-two years which have since elapsed, a reduction should have taken place in the proportion which they bear to the rest of the constituency? Have their condition and character retrograded in a manner to justify this retrogression of numbers? Have they no claims to an extension of the suffrage? I think the facts are clear, and I think my hon. Friend has shown that a great portion of the facts are reducible to figures, and are capable of being represented in a form and with a force almost mathematical, with reference to education and to the state of the press. Let me, then, refer to one or two points which are not reducible to figures. We are told, for instance, that the working classes are given to the practice of strikes. I believe it is the experience of the employers of labour that these strikes are more and more losing the character of violence and compulsory interference with the free will of their own comrades and fellow-workmen, and are assuming that legal and, under certain circumstances, legitimate character, which they possess as the only means by which, in the last resort, labour can fairly assert itself against capital in the peaceful strife of the labour market. Let us take, too, that which in former times I believe to have been the besetting sin of labour—the disposition of the majority not to recognize the right of the minority, and, indeed, of every single individual, to sell his labour for what he thinks fit. On behalf of the labouring classes, I must, in passing, say that this doctrine is much harder for them to practise than for us to preach. In our condition of life and feeling, we have nothing analogous to that which the working man cannot but feel when he sees his labour being, as he thinks, undersold. Yet still it is our duty to assert in the most rigid terms, and to carry high the doctrine of the right of every labouring man, whether with or against the approval of his class, to sell his labour as high or as low as he pleases. But with respect to this point, which has certainly been in other times, and which I fear still is in certain cases, a point of weakness, I appeal to those who have experience of the working classes, whether there is not reason to believe that the progress of knowledge, and the experience of good Government, and the designs of philanthropy and religion, have borne their fruit? Has not the time come when large portions, at the least, of working men admit the right of freedom of labour, as fully as it could possibly be asserted in this House?

Again, Sir, let us look for a few moments at the altered, the happily altered, relations of the working classes to the Government, the laws, the institutions, and, above all, to the throne of this country. Let us go back—it is no long period in the history of a nation—to an epoch not very many years before the passing of the Reform Bill, and consider what was the state of things at a time when many of us were unborn, and when most of us were children—I mean, to the years which immediately succeeded the peace of 1815. We all know the history of those times; most of us recollect the atmosphere and the ideas, under the influence of which we were brought up. They were not ideas which belonged to the old current of English history; nor were they in conformity with the liberal sentiments which pervaded, at its best periods, the politics of the country, and which harmonized with the spirit of the old British Constitution. They were, on the contrary, ideas referable to those lamentable excesses of the first French Revolution, which produced here a terrible re-action, and went far to establish the doctrine that the masses of every community were in permanent antagonism with the laws under which they lived, and were disposed to regard those laws, and the persons by whom the laws were made and administered, as their natural enemies. Unhappily, there are but too many indications to prove that this is no vague or imaginary description. The time to which I now refer, was a time when deficiencies in the harvests were followed by riots, and when rioters did not hold sacred even the person of Majesty itself. In 1817, when the Prince Regent came down to open Parliament, his carriage was assailed by the populace of London; and what was the remedy provided for this state of things? Why, the remedy was sought in the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; or in the limitation of the action of the press, already restricted; or in the employment of spies and the deliberate defence of their employment, who, for the supposed security of the Government, were sent throughout the country to dog the course of private life, and to arrest persons, or to check them, in the formation of conspiracies real or supposed. And what, let me ask, is the state of things now? With truth, Sir, it may be said that the epoch I have named, removed from us, in mere chronological reckoning, by less than half a century, is in the political sphere separated from us by a distance almost immeasurable. For now it may be fearlessly asserted that the fixed traditional sentiment of the working man has begun to be confidence in the law, in Parliament, and even in the executive Government. Of this gratifying state of things it fell to my lot to receive a single, indeed, but a significant proof no later than yesterday. [Cries of "No, no!" and laughter.] The quick-witted character of hon. Gentlemen opposite outstrips, I am afraid, the tardy movement of my observations. Let them only have a very little patience, and they will, I believe, see cause for listening to what I shall say. I was about to proceed to say, in illustration of my argument, that only yesterday I had the satisfaction of receiving a deputation of working men from the Society of Amalgamated Engineers. That society consists of very large numbers of highly-skilled workmen, and has two hundred and sixty branches; it is a society representing the very class in which we should most be inclined to look for a spirit of even jealous independence of all direct relations with the Government. But the deputation came to state to me that the society had large balances of money open for investment, and that many of its members could not feel satisfied unless they were allowed to place their funds in the hands of the Government, by means of a modification in the rules of the Post Office savings banks. Now that, I think, I may say, without being liable to any expression of adverse feeling on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite, was a very small but yet significant indication, among thousands of others, of the altered temper to which I have referred. Instead, however, of uttering on the point my own opinions, I should like to use the words of the working classes themselves. In an address which, in company with my right hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, I heard read at a meeting which was held in the Potteries last autumn, they say, of their own spontaneous Motion, uninfluenced by the action of their employers, in relation to the legislation of late years—

“The great measures that have been passed during the last twenty years by the British Legislature have conferred incalculable blessings on the whole community, and particularly on the working classes, by unfettering the trade and commerce of the country, cheapening the essentials of our daily sustenance, placing a large proportion of the comforts and luxuries of life within our reach, and rendering the obtainment of knowledge comparatively easy among the great mass of the sons of toil.”

And this is the mode in which they then proceed to describe their view of the conduct of the upper classes towards them—

“Pardon us for alluding to the kindly conduct now so commonly evinced by the wealthier portions of the community to assist in the physical and moral improvement of the working classes. The well-being of the toiling mass is now generally admitted to be an essential to the national weal. This forms a pleasing contrast to the opinions cherished half a century ago. The humbler classes also are duly mindful of the happy change, and, without any abatement of manly independence, fully appreciate the benefits resulting therefrom, contentedly fostering a hopeful expectation of the future. May heaven favour and promote this happy mutuality! as we feel confident that all such kindly interchange materially contributes to the general good.”

Now, such language does, in my opinion, the greatest credit to the parties from whom it proceeds. This is a point on which no difference of opinion can prevail. I think I may go a step further, and consider these statements as indicating not only the sentiments of a particular body at the particular place from which they proceeded, but the general sentiments of the best-conducted and most enlightened working men of the country. It may, however, be said, that such statements prove the existing state of things to be satisfactory. But surely this is no sufficient answer. Is it right, I ask, that in the face of such dispositions, the present law of almost entire exclusion should continue to prevail? Again, I call upon the adversary to show cause. And I venture to say that every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness or of political danger is morally entitled to come within the pale of the Constitution. Of course, in giving utterance to such a proposition, I do not recede from the protest I have previously made against sudden, or violent, or excessive, or intoxicating change; but I apply it with confidence to this effect, that fitness for the franchise, when it is shown to exist—as I say it is shown to exist in the case of a select portion of the working class—is not repelled on sufficient grounds from the portals of the Constitution by the allegation that things are well as they are. I contend, moreover, that persons who have prompted the expression of such sentiments as those to which I have referred, and whom I know to have been Members of the working class, are to be presumed worthy and fit to discharge the duties of citizenship, and that to admission to the discharge of those duties they are well and justly entitled. The present franchise, I may add, on the whole—subject, of course, to some exceptions—draws the line between the lower middle class and the upper order of the working class. As a general rule, the lower stratum of the middle class is admitted to the exercise of the franchise, while the upper stratum of the working class is excluded. That I believe to be a fair general description of the present formation of the constituencies in boroughs and towns. Is it a state of things, I would ask, recommended by clear principles of reason? Is the upper portion of the working classes inferior to the lowest portion of the middle? That is a question I should wish to be considered on both sides of the House. For my own part, it appears to me that the negative of the proposition may be held with the greatest confidence. Whenever this Question comes to be discussed, with the view to an immediate issue, the conduct of the general body of the operatives of Lancashire cannot be forgotten. What are the qualities which fit a man for the exercise of a privilege such as the franchise? Self-command, self-control, respect for order, patience under suffering, confidence in the law, regard for superiors; and when, I should like to ask, were all these great qualities exhibited in a manner more signal, I would even say more illustrious, than under the profound affliction of the winter of 1862? I admit the danger of dealing with enormous masses of men; but I am now speaking only of a limited portion of the working class, and I, for one, cannot admit that there is that special virtue in the nature of the middle class which ought to lead to our drawing a marked distinction, a distinction almost purporting to be one of principle, between them and a select portion of the working classes, so far as relates to the exercise of the franchise.

But, Sir, this Question has received a very remarkable illustration from the experience of the last few years. So far as Lancashire is concerned, we have the most extraordinary evidence—evidence amounting almost to mathematical demonstration—of the competency of the working man to discharge those duties of retail trade and the distribution of commodities, which are commonly intrusted to the lower part of the middle class. I allude to the evidence afforded by the marvellous success in that particular county (and I hope the example of that county may not be too eagerly followed elsewhere) of the co-operative system. For my own part, I am not ashamed to say that, if twenty or ten years ago anybody had prophesied to me the success of that system, as it has recently been exhibited in Rochdale and other towns in the north—if I had been told that labouring men would so associate together with mutual advantage, to the exclusion of the retail dealer who comes between the producer and the consumer of commodities, I should have regarded the prediction as absurd. There is, in my opinion, no greater social marvel at the present day than the manner in which these societies flourish in Lancashire, combined with a consideration of the apparent soundness of the financial basis on which they are built; for the bodies of men who have had recourse to the co-operative system have been, as it would appear, those who have stood out with the most manly resolution against the storms of adversity, who have been the last to throw themselves on the charity of their neighbours, and who have proved themselves to be best qualified for the discharge of the duties of independent citizens. And when we have before us considerable numbers of men answering to this description, it is, I think, well worth our while to consider what is the title which they advance to the generous notice of Parliament in regard to their appeal to be admitted in such measure as may upon consideration seem fit, to the exercise of the franchise. I, for myself, confess that I think the investigation will be far better conducted if we approach the question at an early date, in a calm frame of mind, and without having our doors besieged by crowds, or our table loaded with petitions; rather than if we postpone entering upon it until a great agitation has arisen.

And now, Sir, one word in conclusion. I believe that it has been given to us of this generation to witness, advancing as it were under our very eyes from day to day, the most blessed of all social processes; I mean the process which unites together not the interests only but the feelings of all the several classes of the community, and which throws back into the shadows of oblivion those discords by which they were kept apart from one another. I know of nothing which can contribute, in any degree comparable to that union, to the welfare of the commonwealth. It is well, Sir, that we should be suitably provided with armies, and fleets, and fortifications; it is well too that all these should rest upon and be sustained, as they ought to be, by a sound system of finance, and out of a revenue not wasted by a careless Parliament, or by a profligate Administration. But that which is better and more weighty still is that hearts should be bound together by a reasonable extension, at fitting times, and among selected portions of the people, of every benefit and every privilege that can justly be conferred upon them; and, for one, I am prepared to give my support to the Motion now made by my hon. Friend (Mr. Baines), because I believe, and am persuaded, that it will powerfully tend to that binding and blending and knitting of hearts together, and thus to the infusion of new vigour into the old, but in the best sense still young, and flourishing, and undecaying British Constitution.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, I think it must be admitted that we have had reason to deplore the absence of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government more than once during our recent discussions. His presence would be of value to us in the discussion of matters, not only of foreign policy, but of domestic interest; but never would it have been more useful than in the reply we might expect from him—an unanswerable reply—to his refractory Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the midst of grave events of European interest the question of Parliamentary Reform suddenly re-appears, and I would beg the attention of the House to the way in which it turns up at such a crisis. It appears that individual Members, for whose character and consistency I have a great respect, are of opinion that the Constitution of the country should be changed. The hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) introduced a few days ago a Bill to extend the county franchise, and he must have been pleased with the result of his Motion, for he had the support of the noble Viscount in a most enthusiastic speech [a laugh] which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought it fit to follow up to-day in a speech directly leading to universal suffrage. The Motion of the hon. Member for Surrey was rejected—the sun has set and risen since—nothing unusual has occurred—and if this Motion also should be rejected, such is my opinion of the intelligence of the working classes, of which we have heard so much from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I believe the result will be received with the same national unconcern as was the consequence of the rejection of the Motion of the hon. Member for Surrey. But why, let me ask, should the House entertain a Motion of the magnitude of that under our notice, emanating, as it does, from a private Member? On this point I shall again refer to the authority of the noble Viscount. On one of those fortunate occasions when he was for a short time driven from office, the noble Viscount was asked by Mr. Duncombe to lay on the table the Bill for Parliamentary Reform which he had intended, had he remained in office, to have brought forward. The noble Viscount, though out of office one of the foremost men in the House, replied to Mr. Duncombe that a measure proposing a change in the representation of the people was a matter of such importance that, in his private station, he could not venture to lay it before the House. A measure of that kind, he said, must emanate from the Government, be introduced by the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and maintained by their authority before Parliament. Now, that answer supplies, I contend, a complete objection to the present Motion, even if there were no other; because if one private Member can carry a Motion to reduce the borough franchise to £6, there is no reason why another hon. Gentleman below the gangway may not propose to reduce it to £3, which has been mentioned in the present debate as a possible franchise. Therefore, the answer of the noble Viscount refusing, as a private Member, to introduce a Reform Bill, is a satisfactory reply to the Motion of the hon. Member for Leeds, and sustains the Amendment of my hon. Friend near me (Mr. Cave). I heard the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this point with some surprise, because when he spoke of the shortcomings of Parliament, and when the hon. Member for Leeds spoke of the necessity for redeeming the lost honour of the Government (the word “lost” is my own), I daresay that the House had forgotten the language of the right hon. Gentleman on the memorable occasion when the Government that he served then, and serves now, were invited to withdraw their Reform Bill. I shall trouble the House with his observations—

“The right hon. Baronet the Member for Herefordshire, whose good faith in giving us the advice no one can doubt, also recommended us to withdraw the Bill. The course which the right hon. Gentleman asks us to take, however, is one which it is impossible for the Government to adopt. I may, at all events, venture to say for myself, that in my opinion any Ministry which should have introduced a measure such as this with so little caution, and in a shape so unfitted to undergo discussion as to render it expedient that it should be withdrawn, without the decision of the House being taken upon it, would in so acting have covered itself with irretrievable disgrace. I may add that no such idea, or intention, or dream as the adoption of such a course presupposes has ever entered our heads.”

To withdraw that Reform Bill would, according to the strong language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, cover the Government that introduced it with irretrievable disgrace. In a few days afterwards they withdrew it. I leave every hon. member to draw the necessary conclusion. When observations are made upon the conduct of Parliament and the honour of the Government, I am justified in appealing to the testimony of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and while I admit that a Government which introduces a Bill of vast importance must be understood to have asked their character and credit upon it, I shall presently have occasion to show that the same men who resorted to the factious contrivance of an abstract Resolution to evict their opponents from power, when they themselves introduced a Bill not as good as the one they rejected, covered themselves, according to the words of the right hon. Gentleman, with "irretrievable disgrace," by withdrawing it without the decision of the House having been taken upon it. When we are told that we ought to adopt this Bill, I ask the House to consider another subject. A great measure of Reform was introduced by the Government I admit, and a very important measure by the Government of Earl Derby. What is the present method of managing Parliamentary Reform? One hon. Gentleman cuts a slice out of the first Bill, lays it on the table, and calls upon the House to adopt it. Another highly respectable Member of Parliament cuts out another slice, and says, "Adopt that," regardless of the general scope of either of those measures to which I have referred. Without any provisos or safeguards, a particular clause is abstracted from a Bill, and the House of Commons is required to settle the question by selecting one part of an important measure and rejecting the rest. My confident belief is, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in making the speech which we have heard, never imagined that the House of Commons would assent to the proposal, but that he thought it to be a safe opportunity and a good occasion on which to make a little political capital. He took care to tell us very unequivocally that the hon. Member for Leeds had no connection with the Government; that the Government had nothing to do with the hon. Member, nor the hon. Member with the Government. I understood him to hint in his usual peculiar manner—vague and undefined as his language sometimes is, still

we can make out his meaning—that the time was not suitable for the Government to deal with the subject; that, personally, he had no objection to the details of the measure, but would not pledge himself to them; that he was not quite certain that, being the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he ought to touch the figures to which reference had been made, but that he thought that he might give a safe, indefinite, and worthless support to an impracticable scheme. I think I might almost content myself by giving to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the answer which the noble Viscount at the head of the Government gave to Mr. Duncombe. But the right hon. Gentleman has a peculiar mode—rather an abstract mode—of presenting a question to the House by telling us what the hon. Member for Leeds means by his Bill. That is no argument. The question is what the Bill means. Now the Bill speaks for itself, and we can all understand it. It proposes to introduce some 250,000 or 300,000 men whom we do not know much about, suddenly into the Constitution. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members opposite cheer; but if I do not know much about a very difficult subject, I do not like to touch it. Hon. Members are quite satisfied to introduce half a million of persons into the constituencies, and to do it under the allegation, which has no foundation in fact, that the introduction of this vast body is to be scattered over the whole of the country. Now, we know that this Bill cannot apply at all to the great cities, and must apply with overwhelming effect to certain boroughs in the country. We know very well that in this city there are very few houses the rent of which is not £10 a year, and that a great number of the working classes vote for the Members representing our metropolitan boroughs. Are we not satisfied with what we have got? Are we ungrateful for what Reform has done for us? Are we such political cormorants as to demand that all England shall be metropolitanized? I confess that I am slow to believe it. Abstracting the large cities, and remembering that the change will apply only to a certain class of boroughs in the country, we must see that the sudden admission to the franchise of these 250,000 or 300,000 persons is a very perilous political experiment, which once made can never be altered or reversed—an experiment which, if made at all, ought to be propounded by the responsible Ministers of the Crown, acting in favour of a Bill of this kind, at such a time and in such a manner, are more likely to disturb that good feeling than to secure it. I do not admit that it is the theory of our Constitution that there should be no unrepresented men. At what time, I ask the hon. Member for Leeds, was the franchise ever separated from this condition—that it was to be associated, not with multitudes or vast masses of men, but with those who had sufficient property and would exercise a free and independent will? The last argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that the working classes are so contented with their superiors that they would always vote with them, and never differ from them. I do not think that proves that they would have an independent will. And what was 40s. a year in the reign of Henry IV., the time that it was made the test of the franchise in counties? Has the hon. Gentleman considered that the equivalent for that sum was, in the reign of Queen Anne, £12, then £20, and now £30 a year? These Gentlemen would exclaim against reverting to the ancient principles of the Constitution, but the wisdom of our forefathers is not to be forgotten. Their idea of a county constituency was that the voter should be able to gird his sword upon his thigh and follow the knight of the shire to fight against the enemies of the Crown and kingdom—and it was an excellent idea. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines) says that he objects to all sharp lines. Is not £6 a sharp line? What will you say to the man who pays £5, or £4, or £3 a year, and who is hinted at in the second clause of this exceedingly curt production? That argument is well put by Mr. Austin, who says—

“Every extension of the franchise in the direction of universal suffrage tends to introduce it, for the jealousy and ambition of the excluded classes are inflamed by the admission of those whose place in the social scale is not higher than their own.”

The argument is a very philosophical and, in my judgment, a very wise one. It is this. If you admit 200,000 or 300,000 new men to the franchise, what will be the feelings of the persons below them? They will say, according to the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-day, Is not the superior workman equal to the lowest of the middle class? I clearly, would the working man exclaim, am equal to those who are included; I am excluded because I pay only £4 a year; I demand my right; and I should like to know how it could be refused. The origin of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer can very easily be traced. Some time ago he received a deputation, to whom he made a statement which, when I read it in the newspapers, prepared me for a brilliant oration at the first convenient opportunity, and during the sittings of the Conference that opportunity has arisen. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman said—

“He thought the remark of Mr. Odgers respecting the franchise perfectly justifiable” (as I do not know what the remark of Mr. Odgers was I cannot state it); “there was no doubt the Liberal party in the House of Commons had failed in their duty in this respect towards the working classes, to whom he thought the franchise should be extended, and about which he should shortly have something to say in the House.”

We have had that something to-day. Let me refer for a moment to those meetings which have been held on Primrose Hill, and their mode of dealing with the right hon. Gentleman. I beg those respectable men not to suppose that I think their original meeting ought to have been dispersed. I thought it a most reasonable thing that they should inquire what had become of General Garibaldi. He had been well received here, the diet was good, the company excellent—I believe equal to that of the selectest circles of Caprera; he was in the enjoyment of rude health, as every one who saw him could perceive; he was quite content with the country, and the country with him—he was about to visit the provinces—when suddenly he vanished. The working classes thought fit to meet upon the classic site of Primrose Hill to inquire into this matter, and immediately with a happy instinct, they selected the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Shaftesbury, and one or two other eminent persons, as the chief offenders, and determined to deal with them accordingly. They said that it was absolutely necessary that Parliament should be reformed; and why? That as soon as they got admission to this House they might demolish the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So that if the right hon. Gentleman should attain the object of his new-born zeal, which must have grown up since he represented Newark in the good old times—so soon as these decided characters gain admission into the House, they will make an attack upon the Treasury benches which it would be impossible for the Ministry, feeble as they are, to withstand. The Chancellor of the Exchequer advocates the extension of the franchise on

also pronounced a memorable opinion, that in his judgment it was a Motion that emanated from a party—I forget whether he used the word “faction”—which emanated from a party, and was not intended to promote the discussion of the subject. How, therefore, does this question now stand before you? You would not listen to a Bill which had in it much that was good. Then a new Government comes into power. The first year of their ministry they are too busy to introduce a Reform Bill. Multifarious occupations engross their minds, and there is no Reform Bill; yet you Reformers are all content. The next year arrives and brings with it a Reform Bill; but, as far as I could understand, no body of gentlemen were more rejoiced to see it die out tranquilly than were its creators. I believe that the inventors of the measure submitted to its withdrawal with perfect composure. I cannot read the hearts of men; but, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have conceived it to be an act which would subject his Government to “irretrievable disgrace,” he quickly recovered his spirits, shook off the disgrace, and has remained in office from that time to the present without any Reform Bill, or any proposal to introduce one. Now, when a Conference is sitting upon Denmark—and there is, I suppose, a prospect of an early dissolution—it is advisable to make a speech which is to lead to nothing, and to announce to the working classes of this country, who are not to be caught with chaff, that at some indefinite time, in some indefinite manner, by somebody, nobody can tell whom, a Bill will be introduced which will recognize their many virtues and acknowledge their growth in knowledge and industry. Thus the matter stands. Has the right hon. Gentleman said that the Bill is to be carried? Has he said that the Government as a Government will support it? I listened with all possible attention to ascertain whether there was anything serious in his support of the Bill; but, although he spoke from the Treasury Bench, I heard nothing to induce me to think that he spoke the sentiments of the noble Viscount. I heard nothing to show that he was authorized by the head of the Government to deliver that eloquent though sophistical speech; therefore, I come to the conclusion that in this assembly of busy and practical men the Motion is only intended to afford an opportunity for making speeches useful for electioneering purposes. Might I ask Her Majesty's Government whether the £6 men are to be introduced to restore the balance of power in Europe, or to restore the balance of party in favour of Her Majesty's Government? What way will it be? Was there ever before heard in an assembly of reflecting and educated men such an argument as the Chancellor of the Exchequer employed? “There you sit,” he said to us; “I throw the onus upon you.” I answer, “There you sit; I throw the onus upon you.” A proposal is made to change the constitution and to introduce, it may be, 300,000 men into the constituencies of a few boroughs in the kingdom, and the person who propounds it says, “I have no need to prove the wisdom of the innovation. It does not lie upon me to consider the facts or to offer arguments. I throw upon you, who are the objectors, to find reasons, if you can, for I can find none, in favour of the measure.” Would such an argument be endured in any tribunal or in any assembly of reasonable men? No! On the contrary, it lies, according to every rule of reason, on those who propound this scheme to show, not only that it is wise and safe, but that it is expedient. The hon. Member for Leeds repeated the word “right.” I deny the abstract right of any class of persons in this country to possess votes. I deny that the Constitution ever asserted that principle. I also dispute the truth of what has been said as to unrepresented people. Are the working classes unrepresented? Does not the hon. Member for Birmingham feel for them? Does he not represent them? Every word that has been spoken to-day is an argument to prove that they are felt for, that their interests have been considered, and that legislation has been directed to their benefit. And when you come to the practical result of your argument, it is that the people are in perfect concord, harmony, and affection with the classes who are above them. If so, how does the argument apply? If the working classes are happy, if they are prosperous, if they have been advancing in knowledge and education under the system which exists, how does it follow that you should, therefore, radically change the system which has produced such results? The figures that have been referred to, the newspapers that have been cited, the eloquent passage just read by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, only prove how much good feeling and good sense there is in the people of this country; and it must be conceded that those who argue in favour of a Bill of this kind, at such a time and in such a manner, are more likely to disturb that good feeling than to secure it. I do not admit that it is the theory of our Constitution that there should be no unrepresented men. At what time, I ask the hon. Member for Leeds, was the franchise ever separated from this condition—that it was to be associated, not with multitudes or vast masses of men, but with those who had sufficient property and would exercise a free and independent will? my right; and I should like to know how it could be refused. The origin of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer can very easily be traced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer advocates the extension of the franchise on the ground that the working classes are industrious and respectable. I believe they are what he has said. So little inclination have I to speak disrespectfully of any class of people, that when a Bill was introduced conferring a lodger and educational franchise I thought it was wise. But what is the argument of the hon. Gentleman who introduces the Bill? He sums up all the newspapers, and contends that they are only read by the non-electors. How does he prove that they are not read by the electoral body? I, too, have some figures here, and I consider them quite as good as those of the hon. Gentleman. The total number of borough and county voters is 1,285,385, and multiplying the constituency by 300, which excludes the odd 65 days on which they do not read newspapers, it gives a total of 385,615,500. I only allow one newspaper to each elector, and yet there is a calculation surpassing all the statistics of the hon. Gentleman. Having disposed of the argument founded on the newspapers, I willingly admit with the hon. Gentleman that many of the penny newspapers are well conducted and very largely read. Either he or some one else referred to America, where newspapers are published at a halfpenny, and where they influence the Government of the States very largely. I am told that Congress is seriously considering the propriety of taking a halfpenny newspaper into its pay in order that its proceedings may be reported. At present nobody minds what Congress says or does, and unless a halfpenny journal condescends to report what Members say their orations will never be known to posterity. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of the middle classes and of their refusal to admit the just claims of those below them in the social scale; but among the middle classes must be included a large number of the better order of working men who, by their own industry and energy, have worked their way upwards. Those men are now in possession of votes—for in this great and thriving country a large estate is not needed to constitute an elector. Let me ask the hon. Gentleman, does he think that the right moment to make an experiment on a great scale in the direction of democracy is just at the time when the democratic principle itself is on its trial? And in putting this question to him, I must in candour add that there was a vast contrast between the moderation of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds and the extravagance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say—and I thought the words so remarkable that I wrote them down—"Every man who is not subject to any personal incapacity ought to have the franchise." That points directly to universal suffrage; and although the right hon. Gentleman immediately afterwards went on to explain—his talent for copious explanation I take to be even more remarkable than his power of luminous exposition—those were the very words he used. When the idea so thoroughly carried into practical operation across the Atlantic is now put before us, as men of sense we ought to express an opinion upon it; and though the democratic principle invigorates such a Constitution as ours, the question whether it ought to be made the predominant element of the State, and whether this House should be thrown into utter want of harmony with the other branch of the Legislature by the concentration of the whole power of the country in the masses proposed to be enfranchised, assumes a magnitude and importance not to be overrated. Inquiry was made in a city of 20,000 electors, with which I am acquainted, as to what classes of householders were at present excluded from the franchise; and it was found that there were some living in wretched back lanes and in the most filthy parts of that large city who let out portions of their small and frail tenements at 1s. a week to one person and 6d. a week to another, retaining an interest perhaps equal in amount in their own possession, besides the key of the hall door. Persons in such a position are among those proposed to be admitted to the franchise, and they are precisely those who would be exposed to the influences so well described in the course of the debate, not having a free and independent will to exercise. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "Are we to wait till the working classes agitate?" Now, that looked to me very like an invitation to agitate. If I may express it in my own humble, unoratorical fashion, it seemed to me that the meaning of that observation was, Why don't you agitate—why don't you complain? Why, Sir, the working classes might naturally reply, we have no grievance. Oh, but you ought to imagine a grievance—can it be that you have nothing to complain of? Well, no complaint in particular, except the dispersing of the meeting on Primrose Hill and the sending away of Garibaldi. Practically, what grievance has been put forward, what petitions have been presented, what complaints have been made? It is said that the feeling of the English people in favour of liberty is so strong that they have expressed sympathy with every free State and every nation striving for liberty all over the world. I rejoice that they did so; but, according to my estimate of the event which has most recently taken place, they expressed their sympathy with an eminent Italian, not because they admired his political views, but because they thought him an unselfish, disinterested, heroic man, who risked his life in an undertaking from which he gained nothing, though achieving the liberties of others. Yet are you aware that this same eminent person proposed that the Chambers at Turin should be dissolved, and the King made Dictator, in order to carry out the objects on which he was bent? Surely, such a proposal would not be consistent with constitutional Government. It would be a very interesting question to solve, whether liberty has suffered most from democracy or despotism; whether the wits who write, and the men who think, have not found out that by appealing to the suffrage of the masses, always ready to be governed by master minds, the ambitious cannot obtain power as complete and uncontrolled as the absolute Imperial rulers of the world. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who to-day addressed to the working classes such dangerous arguments in favour of agitation, introduced into his speech a very curious passage about the results of the French Revolution and the relations at that time subsisting between the people and the State. What is the use, on a practical subject of this kind, of introducing what occurred before most of the Members now in the House were born? I do not know how matters touching Reform stood in 1815. I only know that we had then just concluded a glorious war conducted by the great Wellington; and I know what was said by M. Thiers in the French Senate of the results then achieved by Castlereagh, and I believe that if he were now our Foreign Minister England would not be the laughing stock of Europe. Lord Castlereagh was a Minister who knew how to assert the dignity and power of England at the right moment; and, as M. Thiers said, he achieved more than the great leaders who conducted the armies and fleets of England to victory. Why does the right hon. Gentleman connect this question with the French Revolution? What has that to do with the question before the House? I venture to say that upon the records of no popular assembly which ever existed in the world can a greater number of remedial measures be found than have been passed by this House from the time of the French Revolution to the present in favour of the mass of the English people? Merciful laws, wise improvements in every branch of the State, ending in the enjoyment of all those blessings and comforts and advantages which Gentlemen opposite admit indeed, but which they use to furnish them with an argument against the value of the system under which they live, instead of being the most powerful and conclusive argument in its favour. The right hon. Gentleman read a passage from a paper which we all admired. But it seems to me a very illogical process to produce the compositions of particular persons, who think correctly and who write in terms and language that command our approval, and then to say, "Will you not admit these admirable critics and thousands like them to the right of voting?" If he will bring me those selected individuals who write so gracefully, I shall be proud to assist in passing a special Act, even to introduce on their behalf the educational franchise which Gentlemen opposite refused to listen to. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer no doubt believes that the opinions which he advocated to-day would, if adopted, be for the benefit of the country; but I ask the hon. Member who introduced this measure, does he, or does anybody believe that the Government of Her Majesty are about to take up his cause, or that if the Bill be read a second time they will give him their support cordially and sincerely, after the fate which has overtaken the proposition of the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Locke King), who sits behind him? No, they will both share the same fate; and a Reform Bill will be reserved, in the words of the noble Viscount, till there is a Government "strong enough to take up a measure of the kind, and sincere enough to prosecute it to a satisfactory conclusion." The right hon. Gentleman called on this House in a marked manner to say in what consisted the security and strength of States. Those who assert and advocate the absolute necessity for a great increase of democratic power in the State will allow me to refer not merely to what is passing across the Atlantic at the present hour, but to the whole page of history. According as democratic influence has been increased until it became overwhelming, liberty in every State has perished. Look at the patrician Senate, when supplanted by democracy it fell beneath military power. Look at the brilliant Commonwealths of Italy. They had their day of freedom, and, with one striking exception, they fell, and quickly—

"A thousand years scarce serve to form a State,
An hour may lay it in the dust, and when
Can man its shattered splendour renovate?"

A step in the wrong direction may be fatal to the greatness of a State. I, therefore, ask the House to refuse its assent to an experiment the consequences of which cannot be foreseen, and to preserve to posterity the incalculable blessings which Gentlemen bringing forward this Motion admit that the people possess, and which may they long continue to enjoy.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not but think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had widely diverged, in the course of his eloquent address, from the essential merits of the question then under consideration. He did not, however, rise to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman into the history of the Primrose Hill meeting, or of those measures for the benefit of the working classes, nearly every one of which he and his Friends had opposed, but to congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) on the great advantage to the cause which he advocated that had been gained, not only by his able and moderate speech, but by that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The cause of Reform would manifestly receive a great impetus from this discussion. The hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave) was surprised that there had been no Reform riots on the part of the working men. The fact was that the working men had long outgrown ideas of that kind—there would be no more Reform riots—but the secret of their inactivity lay in the fact that they were puzzled by the conduct of Parliament about the question of Reform. They could not bring themselves to believe that promises made on both sides of the House to give them a share in the representation would be violated, and therefore they had not spoken out as they would have done if they had had any substantial opposition to contend with. There was, nevertheless, a substantial opposition, and it was all the more dangerous because it was a covert one. Therefore, this discussion would help on the cause of Reform, because, in the speech of the hon. Member for Shoreham, the Opposition boldly disclosed its opinions, and declared it to be better that the working classes of England should not have any share in the representation.

MR. CAVE denied that he had made any such statement.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought that when the hon. Gentleman read the report of his speech in the newspapers, he would find that that was the real purport of the language he had employed. The hon. Member said that a man who was engaged in daily labour could not bring an intelligent mind to the consideration of public questions. But if the hon. Gentleman would go down to Bradford, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) promised to afford him an opportunity of addressing an audience composed entirely of working men, who would listen to him patiently, and who would make to him an answer which would show that although they went daily to their labour they could bring an intelligent mind to bear upon questions of public policy. The hon. Member had certainly talked about a domestic revolution, and he was bound to explain his meaning.

MR. CAVE said, he wished again to explain. The words he had used were taken from a speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member for Birmingham was well able to explain his own meaning, and he, therefore, should not attempt to do so. Without entering further into the speech of the hon. Member for Shoreham he would say this—that it showed the objection entertained to the extension of the franchise to the working classes was no longer based on a question of time, but of principle. The Conservatives were evidently about to return to their old policy of preserving the Constitution from encroachments. Taking the borough of Bradford, there was no class there more deserving than the working men, whom he found to be intelligent and industrious. This Bill would bring into that constituency a number of working men to equal a third of its whole number. The proportion in Bradford, he believed, would be as large as in any other borough; and to designate a measure of that kind as a domestic revolution was most absurd. The conduct of the Government hitherto had been marked by hesitation and indifference on Reform questions; but after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) it would be difficult for them to continue that policy; and the sooner the country knew where it was, and with whom it was dealing on home questions the better. If—which he very much doubted—the present constituencies were Conservative on all constitutional grounds let them have a Conservative Government carried on upon Conservative principles by acknowledged Conservatives, and not a Conservative Government carried on by Liberal leaders on professedly Liberal principles. He hoped that the discussion which had taken place would bring things to an issue. If so it was possible that Members like his hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh) might go over to the other side of the House, and that others who thought they had constituents enough already might not like to increase them. It was better for them and every one else that they should know exactly how they stood. One result, however, was certain to follow from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Hitherto they had been in the extraordinary position of having some of the strongest supporters of the Government sitting on the other side of the House—not men of moderate opinions, whose views were akin to those maintained by the leaders of the Liberal party, but strenuous, exclusive Conservatives, like the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck). The effect of the right hon. Gentleman's speech that day, no doubt, would be to make these Conservative supporters forget the speech delivered on a similar occasion by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, and withdraw their support in future. The Government, no doubt, would be losers to that extent; but the Liberal party would gain very greatly. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been taunted with holding different views now from what he formerly entertained; but as his views became enlightened and enlarged he never retracted from those views. It might be that the country would first have to pass through a Conservative Government; but the time was certainly hastening on when it would no longer be open to the reproach of lagging behind all Christian civilized countries in the share of political power which it accorded to its working classes.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he felt bound to answer the appeal of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), and to acknowledge that he had been accurately described by the hon. Member. He was a decided Conservative, and, as such, he would support any Government that would serve Her Majesty truly to the extent that his principles would admit; and he declared also that, call themselves Conservatives or by whatever other name they chose, he would oppose any Government which departed from the great principles of the Constitution. That was the Conservatism which he professed, that was the Conservatism by which he intended to abide; and he believed that the great strength of the House and of the country consisted in the fact that there were men in that House independent of mere party ties, though he fully acknowledged the propriety of party connection when it was founded on principle. He wished to address himself for a moment to the Question before the House. The hon. Member for Bradford had said truly that this Question of Reform was assuming a practical shape. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced in that as much as the hon. Member, for he held that it was no principle of Conservatism to assume that the temporary arrangements on which the representation of the people was ordered should be treated as permanent and immovable, and as though these arrangements formed the basis of the constitution. He admired that part of the eloquent speech delivered by the right hon. Member for Dublin University (Mr. Whiteside) in which he said, "The constitution of this country had never been based on anything like universal suffrage," and he also approved of the sentiment of the same speech, that "The franchise in England from the earliest times has always been treated as a privilege and as a trust;" while he was as far as the Chancellor of the Exchequer from desiring that the limits assigned to the franchise should exclude the working classes. Why did he resist the Bill of the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Locke King) a few weeks ago? Because by transferring to counties the £10 franchise they would have swamped the 40s. freeholders, the only representatives of the working classes in the counties. What were the facts? The actual definition of the present limits of the constituencies were designated in a Return referred to in a former debate, No. 410 of the Session of 1862; and he begged to call the attention of all the working classes, and of the people generally, to the contents of that document. This Return showed that 8,000,000 of persons, or a minority, were directly represented by 338 Members in that House, while 11,000,000, or the great majority, were represented only by 159 Members. He objected to proceeding in a matter of Reform on the partial basis indicated in this Bill, because it would increase the power of the inhabitants of towns and boroughs, who constituted the dominant class, while it took no steps for removing the unfairness of the representation assigned to those who resided beyond the limits of boroughs and cities. In the interests of the majority of the people, in the interest of the working classes, he should vote for the Previous Question, because any measure which would enlarge the constituencies in cities and boroughs would increase the domination which existed, would strengthen the dominant class, and, instead of adjusting the representation of the people in that House, would increase the injustice. On such grounds he opposed the Motion—not because he desired to exclude the working classes from a larger share of the representation, but because he considered that the majority had a right to be considered, and that any benefit conferred by this Bill would be conferred upon the minority.

MR. BASS said, it was impossible to conceal that the aspect of this question had very materially changed, both in the House and in the country. It would be very interesting to determine in what proportions the House, the Government, the constituencies, and the unenfranchised classes had contributed to place the Question of Parliamentary Reform in its present unpromising aspect. It was, however, of the last importance that the House should be able to show that they had not misled the people, and had not made promises which hon. Members repudiated as soon as they got back to the House. He took it that all the supporters of Lord Derby who voted for the Reform Bill brought in by his Government had clearly acknowledged the necessity of Parliamentary Reform, and those who supported the present Government were committed to it. [At this time the impatience of the House for a division became so great, and the cries of "Divide! Divide!" so continuous, that the address of the hon. Member could be heard only at intervals.] He was understood to refer to the opinions expressed by the leaders of the Opposition in addressing their constituents; and to say that, although the number of voters in the borough he represented (Derby) would be nearly doubled by a £6 franchise, he did not think that that would be so in many other places, or that if it was such an extension would not be attended with danger.

LORD FERMOY was understood to say that he should support the Bill because he believed an extension of the suffrage to be necessary. He did not know how hon. Gentlemen opposite could be considered sincere Reformers after the speech of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Whiteside). Here was a moderate measure of Reform offered to them and they refused it? Were they ready to go before their constituencies as anti-reformers? He believed that if they did they would find the feeling of the country was decidedly against them. He supported the Bill because its effect would be to introduce a large body of the working classes into the constituency.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT said, he had listened with great admiration, but not without great surprise, to the eloquent speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, coming as it did from the most prominent Member of a Government, which, more than any other, had damaged this question of Parliamentary reform, which upon this very question had struck their flag, abandoned their party, and handed over the measure to the statistical championship of the hon. Member for Leeds. He would not enter into the discussion of the Bill, for while, like the hon. Member for Shoroham (Mr. Cave), he did not disagree with its principle, but did not think it opportune, he (Mr. Beaumont) must say that in this matter the excellence of the Bill and its opportuneness so hung together that the best thing they could do who did not think the moment opportune was to vote against the second reading. He saw no special reasons for changing his opinion about the opportuneness of the measure, because, though he had heard a great deal upon that and other occasions of an "ugly rush," the only "ugly rush" that he knew of was the "ugly rush" of a certain party when in opposition to the pigeon-holes of Whitehall and Downing Street. It was because he did not think the present moment opportune that he would record his vote against the Motion.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he felt called upon to protest against the assumption laid down by the other side, that they (the Opposition) were opposed to reform,

It was a mere election manœuvre to say so. There were hon. Gentlemen on that side who had always said that they were not opposed to a measure of Parliamentary reform, but who could not support the details of this Bill, the general result of which he thought would go far beyond the expectations of its supporters.

MR. WATKIN supported the second reading of the Bill on the ground that there were numbers of the working men throughout the country who were qualified to exercise the franchise, and yet were without the power to do so.

MR. GREENALL, as one of those to whom the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) had referred, declared that any promise which he had ever made to his constituents he was ready honourably to perform. He had said that he would support any well considered measure of Reform, and that promise he would keep. He was as favourable as any hon. Gentleman in that House to a fair, a liberal, and a just extension of the suffrage, but he should vote most unhesitatingly against the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds, because he regarded it as unfair, unequal, and calculated in its action to do more harm than good to the cause of reform.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE begged to assure the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) that he, for one, was quite ready to go on the hustings, and when he got there he would most assuredly tell his constituents where Reform originated in that House, and how it was defeated; and in doing so he would not shrink from naming those who had reduced the question of Reform to an organized hypocrisy.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HEYGATE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that at present there was no provision for the construction of new bridges in England and Wales out of any public fund. The only means by which a bridge could be obtained was by an Act of Parliament, which cost nearly as much as the structure itself, by the munificence of some private individual, or by a public subscription. The growing traffic in different parts of the country, however, rendered it necessary that further facilities should be provided. He, therefore, proposed in his Bill to give a permissive power to the magistrates to erect bridges over water-courses. Before anything was done there was to be a memorial from the inhabitants, a report by the surveyor, and an inquiry by four justices, two representing the district and two the county at large. If the majority of the latter were in favour of the project, it was to go to the Quarter Sessions for their decision.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time"—(Mr. Heygate.)

MR. HENLEY said, that the Bill related to an important matter. The principle upon which bridges had hitherto been secured in this country was, that though when built the county was under the obligation of repairing them, the building of them was left to those who wanted them. Now, there was no greater security that bridges should be erected only where they were wanted than that those who asked for them should pay the cost out of their own pocket. He had a great respect for the magistrates, but he did not think they should be intrusted with a roving commission to build bridges. The landowners had burdens enough, and as some thought more than enough, to bear already; and this Bill would impose a new evil without any limit. There was no surer way of making a body of men unpopular than to give them powers of taxation; and that would be the result of this measure in regard to the magistrates. If the Bill passed, there would be an universal bridging over of all water-courses, down to dirty little brooks in every county, at the expense of the rates. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Henley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking it most undesirable that such powers should be placed in the hands of magistrates. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought the powers proposed to be given by this Bill very objectionable; and, after the observations which had been made, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill. Without anticipating any question that might be raised as to the amended Highway Act, he believed it would be better to leave the erection of bridges to be dealt with by the Highway Boards.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that an evil existed for which he thought it was the duty of the House to see a remedy supplied. He thought the whole local taxation had arrived at a pitch which was extremely dangerous to the public interests; but he considered that where a grievance was proved it was the duty of the Government to see that some alteration was made in the Highway Act, giving power to the Highway Boards to provide the necessary bridges.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY hoped the Bill would be withdrawn, believing it would place the justices in a most invidious position. The existing machinery for making bridges over small streams was not so defective as some appeared to suppose.

MR. HEYGATE said, he would, in deference to the opinion of the House, withdraw the Bill.

Amendment, and Motion, by leave,

UNITED STATES—KIDNAPPING FOREIGN SUBJECTS FOR MILITARY SERVICE.—OBSERVATION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords: I wish to draw the attention of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the statements contained in a letter of General Wistar, an officer of the United States army, with reference to the kidnapping of persons, principally foreigners, mostly seamen, and, therefore, very likely to be British subjects, with the view of forcing them to take service in the armies of the United States. I believe I shall do most justice to the case, and to the gallant officer who has written this letter, by reading the whole of it. The letter certainly does him very great credit. The letter is dated Yorktown, April 15, 1864, and is addressed to Major General John A. Dix, New York city. It is in these words—

sulting in apparently well-authenticated information, which I beg respectfully to communicate to you in this unofficial manner, deeming it required by humanity, no less than by our common desire to benefit the service. There seems to be little doubt that many—in fact, I think I am justified in saying that most of these unfortunate men were either deceived or kidnapped, or both, in the most scandalous and inhuman manner in New York city, where they were drugged and carried off to New Hampshire and Connecticut, mustered in and uniformed before their consciousness was fully restored. Even their bounty was obtained by the parties who were instrumental in these nefarious transactions, and the poor wretches find themselves, on returning to their senses, mustered soldiers, without any pecuniary benefit. Nearly all are foreigners, mostly sailors, both ignorant of, and indifferent to, the objects of the war in which they thus suddenly find themselves involved. Two men were shot here this morning for desertion, and over thirty more are now awaiting trial or execution. These examples are essential, as we all understand; but it occurred to me, General, that you would pardon me for thus calling your attention to the greater crime committed in New York, of kidnapping these men into positions where, to their ignorance, desertion must seem like a vindication of their own rights and liberty. Believe me to be, General, with the highest esteem, your obedient servant,

J. J. WISTAR."

"To Major General John A. Dix, New York city." These, my Lords, are the very proper sentiments of this American officer. It is said that many of those who have been kidnapped are seamen and subjects of Her Majesty; it is scarcely possible that those transactions could take place without the knowledge of many of the officers of the American army; it is scarcely possible that the Government itself should not be cognizant of them. I understand that in one case where a Frenchman was detained the French Admiral interfered, the man was released, and the captain in whose regiment he was placed was dismissed the service. Many of your Lordships read a few days ago a statement, which I know to be true from other sources, of the case of a poor man named Edwards, a seaman of one of the Liverpool steamers, and who had only recently been married. He left his clothes on board his vessel, and the money which was due to him, and went on shore by direction of the surgeon to get a warm bath. He was taken to a drinking shop, was drugged, and when he recovered his senses found himself in the uniform of the United States, was told he had enlisted, and carried off to a dépôt, having no means whatever either of joining his family or informing them of the circumstances of his case. He sent a letter in Welsh, which his wife received in Liverpool, and that led to inquiries being made. This is a very serious grievance. I am not aware if the noble Earl has been previously made acquainted with the case. If he has, I wish to know what steps he has taken; and if he has now heard of it for the first time what steps he proposes to take, for the purpose of protecting Her Majesty's subjects from these monstrous atrocities, not only for the future, but in order to obtain the release of those who may have been so seriously ill-treated, and to obtain compensation to them for what they have suffered?

EARL RUSSELL, who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he knew nothing of the letter which the noble Earl had read, further than that a copy of it had been sent to him. Without, therefore, giving any answer to the individual cases stated by the noble Earl, he would say that very great hardships were incurred in such cases. It appeared that the bounty given on enlistment by the general Government of the United States and by the States' Government amounted altogether to 600 dols. or 700 dols.; and this large sum, it appeared, induced nefarious and unprincipled men to get hold of persons on landing in the United States, who drugged them, kept them without food, and tempted them to enlist, when they were marched off to some depot and deprived of all means of obtaining their liberty. Whenever such cases came to the knowledge of Lord Lyons, he had made immediate representations to the United States Government. He was not so much surprised at the unprincipled conduct of the parties referred to as that attempts should be made to throw protection around them; and he was sorry to say that Lord Lyons had made repeated complaints, but in most cases he had not obtained that satisfaction which he had a right to expect. The noble Earl then read the following passages from a memorandum of similar cases which had recently occurred, and the result of the representations made by Lord Lyons;—

"Two other cases have been reported to us by the Board of Trade. The first is that of Hugh Bennett, who stated that having gone on shore from his ship, the Edinburgh, at New York, in order to make a purchase, he was induced to enter a public-house, where he, in company with eleven other steamboat men, had been drugged and carried off to the United States receiving ship North Carolina. This case having been referred to Lord Lyons, he has succeeded in obtaining the man's discharge. The other case is that of a seaman named Charles Thompson, who wrote from Beaufort, South Carolina, on the 25th of February last, to say he had been drugged, and while in that state was enlisted, not knowing anything until he came to himself, when he was informed that he was a soldier. He further stated that as soon as a sailor arrived in the United States he was nearly certain to be drugged and made a soldier of before he knew anything about it, and that in several cases the British Consul had obtained their release."

Several cases had been brought to the notice of the British agents in the American States, in which several British subjects were kidnapped, as was alleged, while in a state of intoxication. In reply to a representation from Lord Lyons, the United States War Department said they would investigate the case, and in a certain sense they did so, examining the recruiting agents and other persons, who stated that the men were sober when they enlisted. Lord Lyons answered, very properly, that that investigation was not satisfactory, it having been carried on entirely in the absence of the men themselves, four or five of whom had been sent forward to the army. The recruiting agents were tempted by the very large bounty to use every unfair means of inveigling men to enlist. He must say it would throw great discredit on the United States Government if such practices were allowed to go on. It was their bounden duty to see that these persons were not forced to enter the service against their will. He must say that these proceedings would render it necessary that Her Majesty's Government should make the strongest remonstrance to the United States Government. No doubt if the facts referred to by the noble Earl were authentic, they formed a very great hardship, and disclosed conduct on the part of agents of the United States Government which was highly reprehensible.

AGRARIAN OFFENCES (IRELAND)— CASE OF MICHAEL DUIGAN & OTHERS.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH rose to move an Address to Her Majesty praying for a copy of the Memorial respecting the release of Michael Duigan and others, convicted of agrarian offences at Westmeath in 1862. The noble Marquess said, that these men were convicted of a very serious offence, and sentenced by Chief Justice Monahan to two years' imprisonment. When only two-thirds of their punishment had been undergone they were released by order of the Lord Lieutenant. The grand jury of Westmeath addressed a remonstrance to his Excellency, protesting against the system of pardoning offenders against the public peace without previous consultation with the local magistrates, specially convened for the purpose. An uncourteous reply was returned, to the effect that the Lord Lieutenant conceived he had sufficient grounds for the course he had pursued. The men were released on the 19th of February last. On the 23rd of March a man named Thomas Welsh, living in the same neighbourhood, was attacked and wounded by a pistol shot in the open day by seven miscreants, and so severely beaten that he died two days afterwards. The fact was, that when the law was relaxed an Irish peasant thought he might with perfect impunity knock down or otherwise maltreat any person who had incurred his hatred. Other cases had also occurred in which violent outrages had been allowed to be committed with comparative impunity. The magistrates of the county of Westmeath felt greatly aggrieved and insulted by the course which the Irish Government had taken. He held that it was most desirable that such matters should no longer be left to the caprice of the authorities in Dublin, but should be referred to the Home Office. The Government were bound, he thought, to disclose the names of those who had deceived them in asking for the remission of punishment in the case he had referred to. He was satisfied that if the Memorial had been sent to the Home Secretary instead of to the Lord Lieutenant it would not have been attended to in the least. The noble Marquess concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of any Memorial received by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or the Irish Government praying for the release of Michael Duigan, Patrick Duigan, and Patrick Egaa, Three Prisoners confined in the County Gaol of Westmeath, convicted at the Summer Assizes of 1862 of Agrarian Offences, or any of them; and of any written Communication forwarding the same, and recommending their Enlargement to the Irish Government."

EARL GRANVILLE said, that in the case referred to everything seemed to have been done in the most regular manner. The condemned persons were sentenced to the maximum punishment allowed by the law. A Memorial was then presented to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who, as he was informed, took all the customary steps on the occasion, consulting with the usual advisers of the Crown and communicating with the Judge; and the result was that the sentence was remitted. There would be no objection to the production of the Memorial; but it would be inconvenient and injurious to the public service that a communication such as the other document moved for should be produced.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the facts of the case were very simple. The county of Westmeath was the headquarters of Ribbonism, and it was difficult to procure evidence on which to convict the offenders. In this case, however, convictions were obtained against three persons for an agrarian offence, and the Judge sentenced them to the highest penalty. The Lord Lieutenant, however, without any communication with the magistrates or grand jury of the county, remitted a part of the punishment. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) said that the Lord Lieutenant consulted with his usual advisers; but he forgot to say that these advisers were the Inspector General of Police and other gentlemen who sat on easy stools in the offices of Dublin Castle assisting in the government of disturbed districts. When the grand jury made a humble representation to the Lord Lieutenant, pointing out the grievous effect such a remission would have on public opinion in the county, all they got in answer was an official reply that his Excellency was perfectly satisfied with the grounds on which the remission had been granted. The Judges had found fault with the grand jury for the state of their county; and these gentlemen, who were obliged to submit to those rebukes, and who were made responsible for the proper administration of justice, were not consulted. It was very difficult for them to do their duty under such circumstances, and he thought the grand jury had a right to demand on what grounds the Lord Lieutenant remitted these penalties. There were rumours afloat of a very awkward description. It was said that the person who brought this case before the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was one of the Members of Parliament for the county of Westmeath, and that improper political pressure had been resorted to to obtain the release of these men. He hoped the House would support the noble Marquess in calling for the production of the documents.

EARL GRANVILLE said, if their Lordships thought the Government had done wrong, a Resolution condemning them ought to be brought forward.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could not assent to the doctrine laid down by the noble Earl (Earl Granville), that if they thought the Government was to blame they had only to bring forward a Resolution. What their Lordships asked for was the means of knowing whether the Government were to blame or not. It appeared that, without any communication with the local magistrates and those who knew the state of the county, these men were released; and it was asserted, though not by his noble Friend, that political influences were brought to bear, and that communications had been received which should be considered, not of a private, but of a public nature. Consequently the noble Marquess asked that the grounds on which the memorial rested should be made known, and he could not but think that the application was most reasonable. This was not the first by many times that the present Government had systematically passed over the local magistrates, and placed their sole reliance on the information received from the police officers. Under such circumstances the peace of the country could not be effectually maintained. If the peace was to be preserved in any country, and especially in Ireland, the Government must carry along with it the gentry and magistracy, and what was wanted was that their Lordships should be satisfied that the release of these men was founded on reason and justice, and not on any local, private, confidential, or political motive. He hoped that the House would insist on the production of the papers.

LORD VAUX OF HARROWDEN said, that as their Lordships were perfectly in the dark on this matter, information should be produced for their satisfaction; but he thought that the production of the Memorial would be sufficient.

EARL GREY said, he could not remember an instance of the production of such documents as those referred to in the Motion, and asked for on the ground—which was, no doubt, unfounded—that an improper communication had been made to the Government, ever being refused. He begged his noble Friend (Earl Granville) would not put the House to the trouble of a division. He should be most reluctant to vote against Her Majesty's Government on a question of this kind, but he really thought that no ground had been shown for refusing to produce the documents.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he should be

most unwilling to put the House to the trouble of a division; but certain remarks had fallen from the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Donoughmore) which were calculated to produce an erroneous impression, and upon which he wished to say a few words. The noble Earl spoke of political influence having been brought to bear—

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he had only stated that there was a rumour to that effect.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was perfectly ignorant that any such influence had been exerted, and he believed there was no foundation whatever for any such rumour. He was not aware that the Home Secretary in this country was in the habit of communicating with the local magistracy in reference to the remission of punishment; and, if that were so, he did not see why the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should be bound to communicate with the local magistrates in Ireland on a similar occasion. At the same time, he certainly would not object to the production of the Memorial and any letters of a public nature; but he could not consent to produce confidential communications, such as might have taken place between the Irish Government and the Judges.

After a few words from Lord BERNERS and the Marquess of WESTMEATH,

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, that no communication, although it might be marked "private," could be considered private which covered a Memorial of the kind referred to. He trusted that no such remedy as that suggested by the noble Marquess, namely, the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, would be hastily adopted. He could not see anything more important to a country situated like Ireland than to have a man of the exalted position of Lord Lieutenant resident there to superintend the administration of the different parts of the Irish Government.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, that with regard to the practice in this country, it was usual for the Secretary of State, when he received a Memorial praying for a remission of punishment, to communicate with the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and to request information as to the evidence from the notes of the Judge.

POLICE RATE (EDINBURGH)—CLERGY STIPENDS.—QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the riotous proceedings lately enacted in Edinburgh, arising out of the seizure and sale of the furniture of certain citizens who refuse to pay that portion of the local rates which, under the name of Police Rate, is (under an Act passed in 1860) levied to pay the stipends of the city clergy; whether it is true that several thousand ratepayers have resolutely refused to pay that portion of the rate, and that the arrears of the several local rates collected along with this rate are accumulating so rapidly as to have reached nearly £20,000; and, whether it is the intention of Government to propose any alteration in the Law?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it was certainly not a fact that there existed any local rate under the name of Police Rate, or any other name, levied for the payment of the stipends of the clergy of the city of Edinburgh. Such a rate had been levied until the year 1860, under the name of the Annuity Tax, but an Act passed in that year provided that the ministers of Edinburgh, being reduced in number, should be paid not by a local rate at all, but by a general charge made upon the revenue of the city. That arrangement was made at the desire of the opponents of the Annuity Tax, for the express purpose of avoiding the imposition of an Ecclesiastical Tax. At the same time, the magistrates were empowered, by the Act of 1860, to levy an additional Police Rate for the supply of any deficiency which was, or might be, occasioned by the charge thus made upon the funds of the city, and the additional rate was, in all respects, a municipal charge for municipal purposes. No doubt some of the ratepayers, but not, he was glad to say, a large number, thought that, notwithstanding the municipal character of this additional rate, its payment was still open to conscientious objections. There was little doubt that on three or four occasions there had been some tumult occasioned by the sale of goods which had been seized for non-payment of the rate; but he had no official information excepting what had been communicated to him in a letter which he had received that day, from which he learnt that those proceedings had been very greatly exaggerated. The most conspicuous case was one in which the public were invited a few days before the event took place by means of handbills to attend and witness the sale of some furniture which had been seized. Under those circumstances, it was not at all extraordinary that a large rabble assembled, and that those engaged in carrying out the law were subject to much annoyance. After they had left, the rabble burnt one of the articles of furniture; but the inhabitants of the city themselves attached no importance to this incident. According to the information which he had received, the arrears consequent upon the refusal to pay the rate, amounted to about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  or 4 per cent upon the whole of the assessment. Usually 5 per cent was allowed as the amount which would cover the non-payments; so that in this instance the percentage would be increased to  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, which, upon a sum of £50,000, was hardly a matter worthy of much consideration. He could not tell the exact number of those who had refused to pay, but the average for the four years previous to 1860 had numbered 3,269, while the average of the four years since that date was 4,976, a difference of no great importance. In answer to the third part of the Question, he begged to say it was not the intention of the Government to propose any alteration in the law.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to know from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the date of the letter from which he derived his information, because he (Mr. Bright) had seen in the papers of that

COUNTY BRIDGES BILL.—[Bill 77.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HEYGATE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that at present there was no provision for the construction of new bridges in England and Wales out of any public fund. The only means by which a bridge could be obtained was by an Act of Parliament, which cost nearly as much as the structure itself, by the munificence of some private individual, or by a public subscription. The growing traffic in different parts of the country, however, rendered it necessary that further facilities should be provided. He, therefore, proposed in his Bill to give a permissive power to the magistrates to erect bridges over water-courses. Before anything was done there was to be a memorial from the inhabitants, a report by the surveyor, and an inquiry by four justices, two representing the district and two the county at large. If the majority of the latter were in favour of the project, it was to go to the Quarter Sessions for their decision.

MR. HENLEY said, that the Bill related to an important matter. The principle upon which bridges had hitherto been secured in this country was, that though when built the county was under the obligation of repairing them, the building of them was left to those who wanted them. Now, there was no greater security that bridges should be erected only where they were wanted than that those who asked for them should pay the cost out of their own pocket. He had a great respect for the magistrates, but he did not think they should be intrusted with a roving commission to build bridges. The landowners had burdens enough, and as some thought more than enough, to bear already; and this Bill would impose a new evil without any limit. There was no surer way of making a body of men unpopular than to give them powers of taxation; and that would be the result of this measure in regard to the magistrates. If the Bill passed, there would be an universal bridging over of all water-courses, down to dirty little brooks in every county, at the expense of the rates. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Henley.)

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking it most undesirable that such powers should be placed in the hands of magistrates. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought the powers proposed to be given by this Bill very objectionable; and, after the observations which had been made, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill. Without anticipating any question that might be raised as to the amended Highway Act, he believed it would be better to leave the erection of bridges to be dealt with by the Highway Boards.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that an evil existed for which he thought it was the duty of the House to see a remedy supplied. He thought the whole local taxation had arrived at a pitch which was extremely dangerous to the public interests; but he considered that where a grievance was proved it was the duty of the Government to see that some alteration was made in the Highway Act, giving power to the Highway Boards to provide the necessary bridges.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY hoped the Bill would be withdrawn, believing it would place the justices in a most invidious position. The existing machinery for making bridges over small streams was not so defective as some appeared to suppose.

MR. HEYGATE said, he would, in deference to the opinion of the House, withdraw the Bill.

FOREIGN SUBJECTS FOR MILITARY SERVICE.—OBSERVATION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords: I wish to draw the attention of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the statements contained in a letter of General Wistar, an officer of the United States army, with reference to the kidnapping of persons, principally foreigners, mostly seamen, and, therefore, very likely to be British subjects, with the view of forcing them to take service in the armies of the United States. I believe I shall do most justice to the case, and to the gallant officer who has written this letter, by reading the whole of it. The letter certainly does him very great credit. The letter is dated Yorktown, April 15, 1864, and is addressed to Major General John A. Dix, New York city. It is in these words—

sulting in apparently well-authenticated information, which I beg respectfully to communicate to you in this unofficial manner, deeming it required by humanity, no less than by our common desire to benefit the service. There seems to be little doubt that many—in fact, I think I am justified in saying that most of these unfortunate men were either deceived or kidnapped, or both, in the most scandalous and inhuman manner in New York city, where they were drugged and carried off to New Hampshire and Connecticut, mustered in and uniformed before their consciousness was fully restored. Even their bounty was obtained by the parties who were instrumental in these nefarious transactions, and the poor wretches find themselves, on returning to their senses, mustered soldiers, without any pecuniary benefit. Nearly all are foreigners, mostly sailors, both ignorant of, and indifferent to, the objects of the war in which they thus suddenly find themselves involved. Two men were shot here this morning for desertion, and over thirty more are now awaiting trial or execution. These examples are essential, as we all understand; but it occurred to me, General, that you would pardon me for thus calling your attention to the greater crime committed in New York, of kidnapping these men into positions where, to their ignorance, desertion must seem like a vindication of their own rights and liberty. Believe me to be, General, with the highest esteem, your obedient servant,

J. J. WISTAR."

"To Major General John A. Dix, New York city."

These, my Lords, are the very proper sentiments of this American officer. It is said that many of those who have been kidnapped are seamen and subjects of Her Majesty; it is scarcely possible that those transactions could take place without the knowledge of many of the officers of the American army; it is scarcely possible that the Government itself should not be cognizant of them. #### UNITED STATES—KIDNAPPING FOREIGN SUBJECTS FOR MILITARY SERVICE.—OBSERVATION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords: I wish to draw the attention of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the statements contained in a letter of General Wistar, an officer of the United States army, with reference to the kidnapping of persons, principally foreigners, mostly seamen, and, therefore, very likely to be British subjects, with the view of forcing them to take service in the armies of the United States. I believe I shall do most justice to the case, and to the gallant officer who has written this letter, by reading the whole of it. The letter certainly does him very great credit. The letter is dated Yorktown, April 15, 1864, and is addressed to Major General John A. Dix, New York city. It is in these words—

sulting in apparently well-authenticated information, which I beg respectfully to communicate to you in this unofficial manner, deeming it required by humanity, no less than by our common desire to benefit the service. There seems to be little doubt that many—in fact, I think I am justified in saying that most of these unfortunate men were either deceived or kidnapped, or both, in the most scandalous and inhuman manner in New York city, where they were drugged and carried off to New Hampshire and Connecticut, mustered in and uniformed before their consciousness was fully restored. Even their bounty was obtained by the parties who were instrumental in these nefarious transactions, and the poor wretches find themselves, on returning to their senses, mustered soldiers, without any pecuniary benefit. Nearly all are foreigners, mostly sailors, both ignorant of, and indifferent to, the objects of the war in which they thus suddenly find themselves involved. Two men were shot here this morning for desertion, and over thirty more are now awaiting trial or execution. These examples are essential, as we all understand; but it occurred to me, General, that you would pardon me for thus calling your attention to the greater crime committed in New York, of kidnapping these men into positions where, to their ignorance, desertion must seem like a vindication of their own rights and liberty. Believe me to be, General, with the highest esteem, your obedient servant,

J. J. WISTAR."

"To Major General John A. Dix, New York city."

These, my Lords, are the very proper sentiments of this American officer. It is said that many of those who have been kidnapped are seamen and subjects of Her Majesty; it is scarcely possible that those transactions could take place without the knowledge of many of the officers of the American army; it is scarcely possible that the Government itself should not be cognizant of them. I understand that in one case where a Frenchman was detained the French Admiral interfered, the man was released, and the captain in whose regiment he was placed was dismissed the service. Many of your Lordships read a few days ago a statement, which I know to be true from other sources, of the case of a poor man named Edwards, a seaman of one of the Liverpool steamers, and who had only recently been married. He left his clothes on board his vessel, and the money which was due to him, and went on shore by direction of the surgeon to get a warm bath. He was taken to a drinking shop, was drugged, and when he recovered his senses found himself in the uniform of the United States, was told he had enlisted, and carried off to a dépôt, having no means whatever either of joining his family or informing them of the circumstances of his case. He sent a letter in Welsh, which his wife received in Liverpool, and that led to inquiries

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. HEYGATE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that at present there was no provision for the construction of new bridges in England and Wales out of any public fund. The only means by which a bridge could be obtained was by an Act of Parliament, which cost nearly as much as the structure itself, by the munificence of some private individual, or by a public subscription. The growing traffic in different parts of the country, however, rendered it necessary that further facilities should be provided. He, therefore, proposed in his Bill to give a permissive power to the magistrates to erect bridges over water-courses. Before anything was done there was to be a memorial from the inhabitants, a report by the surveyor, and an inquiry by four justices, two representing the district and two the county at large. If the majority of the latter were in favour of the project, it was to go to the Quarter Sessions for their decision.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time"—(Mr. Heygate.)

Mr. HENLEY said, that the Bill related to an important matter. The principle upon which bridges had hitherto been secured in this country was, that though when built the county was under the obligation of repairing them, the building of them was left to those who wanted them. Now, there was no greater security that bridges should be erected only where they were wanted than that those who asked for them should pay the cost out of their own pocket. He had a great respect for the magistrates, but he did not think they should be intrusted with a roving commission to build bridges. The landowners had burdens enough, and as some thought more than enough, to bear already; and this Bill would impose a new evil without any limit. There was no surer way of making a body of men unpopular than to give them powers of taxation; and that would be the result of this measure in regard to the magistrates. If the Bill passed, there would be an universal bridging over of all water-courses, down to dirty little brooks in every county, at the expense of the rates. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Henley.)

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking it most undesirable that such powers should be placed in the hands of magistrates. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought the powers proposed to be given by this Bill very objectionable; and, after the observations which had been made, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill. Without anticipating any question that might be raised as to the amended Highway Act, he believed it would be better to leave the erection of bridges to be dealt with by the Highway Boards.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that an evil existed for which he thought it was the duty of the House to see a remedy supplied. He thought the whole local taxation had arrived at a pitch which was extremely dangerous to the public interests; but he considered that where a grievance was proved it was the duty of the Government to see that some alteration was made in the Highway Act, giving power to the Highway Boards to provide the necessary bridges.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY hoped the Bill would be withdrawn, believing it would place the justices in a most invidious position. The existing machinery for making bridges over small streams was not so defective as some appeared to suppose.

Mr. HEYGATE said, he would, in deference to the opinion of the House, withdraw the Bill.

Amendment, and Motion, by leave,

Believe me to be, General, with the highest esteem, your obedient servant,

J. J. WISTAR."

"To Major General John A. Dix, New York city."

These, my Lords, are the very proper sentiments of this American officer. It is said that many of those who have been kidnapped are seamen and subjects of Her Majesty; it is scarcely possible that those transactions could take place without the knowledge of many of the officers of the American army; it is scarcely possible that the Government itself should not be cognizant of them. I understand that in one case where a Frenchman was detained the French Admiral interfered, the man was released, and the captain in whose regiment he was placed was dismissed the service. Many of your Lordships read a few days ago a statement, which I know to be true from other sources, of the case of a poor man named Edwards, a seaman of one of the Liverpool steamers, and who had only recently been married. He left his clothes on board his vessel, and the money which was due to him, and went on shore by direction of the surgeon to get a warm bath. He was taken to a drinking shop, was drugged, and when he recovered his senses found himself in the uniform of the United States, was told he had enlisted, and carried off to a dépôt, having no means whatever either of joining his family or informing them of the circumstances of his case. He sent a letter in Welsh, which his wife received in Liverpool, and that led to inquiries being made. This is a very serious grievance. I am not aware if the noble Earl has been previously made acquainted with the case. If he has, I wish to know what steps he has taken; and if he has now heard of it for the first time what steps he proposes to take, for the purpose of protecting Her Majesty's subjects from these monstrous atrocities, not only for the future, but in order to obtain the release of those who may have been so seriously ill-treated, and to obtain compensation to them for what they have suffered?

EARL RUSSELL, who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he knew nothing of the letter which the noble Earl had read, further than that a copy of it had been sent to him. Without, therefore, giving any answer to the individual cases stated by the noble Earl, he would say that very great hardships were incurred in such cases. It appeared that the bounty given on enlistment by the general Government of the United States and by the States' Government amounted altogether to 600 dols. or 700 dols.; and this large sum, it appeared, induced nefarious and unprincipled men to get hold of persons on landing in the United States, who drugged them, kept them without food, and tempted them to enlist, when they were marched off to some depot and deprived of all means of obtaining their liberty. Whenever such cases came to the knowledge of Lord Lyons, he had made immediate representations to the United States Government. He was not so much surprised at the unprincipled conduct of the parties referred to as that attempts should be made to throw protection around them; and he was sorry to say that Lord Lyons had made repeated complaints, but in most cases he had not obtained that satisfaction which he had a right to expect. The noble Earl then read the following passages from a memorandum of similar cases which had recently occurred, and the result of the representations made by Lord Lyons;—

"Two other cases have been reported to us by the Board of Trade. The first is that of Hugh Bennett, who stated that having gone on shore from his ship, the Edinburgh, at New York, in order to make a purchase, he was induced to enter a public-house, where he, in company with eleven other steamboat men, had been drugged and carried off to the United States receiving ship North Carolina. This case having been referred to Lord Lyons, he has succeeded in obtaining the man's discharge. The other case is that of a seaman named Charles Thompson, who wrote from Beaufort, South Carolina, on the 26th of February last, to say he had been drugged, and while in that state was enlisted, not knowing anything until he came to himself, when he was informed that he was a soldier. He further stated that as soon as a sailor arrived in the United States he was nearly certain to be drugged and made a soldier of before he knew anything about it, and that in several cases the British Consul had obtained their release."

Several cases had been brought to the notice of the British agents in the American States, in which several British subjects were kidnapped, as was alleged, while in a state of intoxication. In reply to a representation from Lord Lyons, the United States War Department said they would investigate the case, and in a certain sense they did so, examining the recruiting agents and other persons, who stated that the men were sober when they enlisted. Lord Lyons answered, very properly, that that investigation was not satisfactory, it having been carried on entirely in the absence of the men themselves, four or five of whom had been sent forward to the army. The recruiting agents were tempted by the very large bounty to use every unfair means of inveigling men to enlist. He must say it would throw great discredit on the United States Government if such practices were allowed to go on. It was their bounden duty to see that these persons were not forced to enter the service against their will. He must say that these proceedings would render it necessary that Her Majesty's Government should make the strongest remonstrance to the United States Government. No doubt if the facts referred to by the noble Earl were authentic, they formed a very great hardship, and disclosed conduct on the part of agents of the United States Government which was highly reprehensible.

AGRARIAN OFFENCES (IRELAND)— CASE OF MICHAEL DUIGAN & OTHERS.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH rose to move an Address to Her Majesty praying for a copy of the Memorial respecting the release of Michael Duigan and others, convicted of agrarian offences at Westmeath in 1862. The noble Marquess said, that these men were convicted of a very serious offence, and sentenced by Chief Justice Monahan to two years' imprisonment. When only two-thirds of their punishment had been undergone they were released by order of the Lord Lieutenant. The grand jury of Westmeath addressed a remonstrance to his Excellency, protesting against the system of pardoning offenders against the public peace without previous consultation with the local magistrates, specially convened for the purpose. An uncourteous reply was returned, to the effect that the Lord Lieutenant conceived he had sufficient grounds for the course he had pursued. The men were released on the 19th of February last. On the 23rd of March a man named Thomas Welsh, living in the same neighbourhood, was attacked and wounded by a pistol shot in the open day by seven miscreants, and so severely beaten that he died two days afterwards. The fact was, that when the law was relaxed an Irish peasant thought he might with perfect impunity knock down or otherwise maltreat any person who had incurred his hatred. Other cases had also occurred in which violent outrages had been allowed to be committed with comparative impunity. The magistrates of the county of Westmeath felt greatly aggrieved and insulted by the course which the Irish Government had taken. He held that it was most desirable that such matters should no longer be left to the caprice of the authorities in Dublin, but should be referred to the Home Office. The Government were bound, he thought, to disclose the names of those who had deceived them in asking for the remission of punishment in the case he had referred to. He was satisfied that if the Memorial had been sent to the Home Secretary instead of to the Lord Lieutenant it would not have been attended to in the least. The noble Marquess concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of any Memorial received by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or the Irish Government praying for the release of Michael Duigan, Patrick Duigan, and Patrick Egan, Three Prisoners confined in the County Gaol of Westmeath, convicted at the Summer Assizes of 1862 of Agrarian Offences, or any of them; and of any written Communication forwarding the same, and recommending their Enlargement to the Irish Government."

EARL GRANVILLE said, that in the case referred to everything seemed to have been done in the most regular manner. The condemned persons were sentenced to the maximum punishment allowed by the law. A Memorial was then presented to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who, as he was informed, took all the customary steps on the occasion, consulting with the usual advisers of the Crown and communicating with the Judge; and the result was that the sentence was remitted. There would be no objection to the production of the Memorial; but it would be inconvenient and injurious to the public service that a communication such as the other document moved for should be produced.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the facts of the case were very simple. The county of Westmeath was the headquarters of Ribbonism, and it was difficult to procure evidence on which to convict the offenders. In this case, however, convictions were obtained against three persons for an agrarian offence, and the Judge sentenced them to the highest penalty. The Lord Lieutenant, however, without any communication with the magistrates or grand jury of the county, remitted a part of the punishment. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) said that the Lord Lieutenant consulted with his usual advisers; but he forgot to say that these advisers were the Inspector General of Police and other gentlemen who sat on easy stools in the offices of Dublin Castle assisting in the government of disturbed districts. When the grand jury made a humble representation to the Lord Lieutenant, pointing out the grievous effect such a remission would have on public opinion in the county, all they got in answer was an official reply that his Excellency was perfectly satisfied with the grounds on which the remission had been granted. The Judges had found fault with the grand jury for the state of their county; and these gentlemen, who were obliged to submit to those rebukes, and who were made responsible for the proper administration of justice, were not consulted. It was very difficult for them to do their duty under such circumstances, and he thought the grand jury had a right to demand on what grounds the Lord Lieutenant remitted these penalties. There were rumours afloat of a very awkward description. It was said that the person who brought this case before the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was one of the Members of Parliament for the county of Westmeath, and that improper political pressure had been resorted to to obtain the release of these men. He hoped the House would support the noble Marquess in calling for the production of the documents.

EARL GRANVILLE said, if their Lordships thought the Government had done wrong, a Resolution condemning them ought to be brought forward.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could not assent to the doctrine laid down by the noble Earl (Earl Granville), that if they thought the Government was to blame they had only to bring forward a Resolution. What their Lordships asked for was the means of knowing whether the Government were to blame or not. It appeared that, without any communication with the local magistrates and those who knew the state of the county, these men were released; and it was asserted, though not by his noble Friend, that political influences were brought to bear, and that communications had been received which should be considered, not of a private, but of a public nature. Consequently the noble Marquess asked that the grounds on which the memorial rested should be made known, and he could not but think that the application was most reasonable. This was not the first by many times that the present Government had systematically passed over the local magistrates, and placed their sole reliance on the information received from the police officers. Under such circumstances the peace of the country could not be effectually maintained. If the peace was to be preserved in any country, and especially in Ireland, the Government must carry along with it the gentry and magistracy, and what was wanted was that their Lordships should be satisfied that the release of these men was founded on reason and justice, and not on any local, private, confidential, or political motive. He hoped that the House would insist on the production of the papers.

LORD VAUX OF HARROWDEN said, that as their Lordships were perfectly in the dark on this matter, information should be produced for their satisfaction; but he thought that the production of the Memorial would be sufficient.

EARL GREY said, he could not remember an instance of the production of such documents as those referred to in the Motion, and asked for on the ground—which was, no doubt, unfounded—that an improper communication had been made to the Government, ever being refused. He begged his noble Friend (Earl Granville) would not put the House to the trouble of a division. He should be most reluctant to vote against Her Majesty's Government on a question of this kind, but he really thought that no ground had been shown for refusing to produce the documents.

most unwilling to put the House to the trouble of a division; but certain remarks had fallen from the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Donoughmore) which were calculated to produce an erroneous impression, and upon which he wished to say a few words. The noble Earl spoke of political influence having been brought to bear—

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he had only stated that there was a rumour to that effect.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was perfectly ignorant that any such influence had been exerted, and he believed there was no foundation whatever for any such rumour. He was not aware that the Home Secretary in this country was in the habit of communicating with the local magistracy in reference to the remission of punishment; and, if that were so, he did not see why the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should be bound to communicate with the local magistrates in Ireland on a similar occasion. At the same time, he certainly would not object to the production of the Memorial and any letters of a public nature; but he could not consent to produce confidential communications, such as might have taken place between the Irish Government and the Judges.

After a few words from Lord BERNERS and the Marquess of WESTMEATH,

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, that no communication, although it might be marked "private," could be considered private which covered a Memorial of the kind referred to. He trusted that no such remedy as that suggested by the noble Marquess, namely, the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, would be hastily adopted. He could not see anything more important to a country situated like Ireland than to have a man of the exalted position of Lord Lieutenant resident there to superintend the administration of the different parts of the Irish Government.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, that with regard to the practice in this country, it was usual for the Secretary of State, when he received a Memorial praying for a remission of punishment, to communicate with the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and to request information as to the evidence from the notes of the Judge.

POLICE RATE (EDINBURGH)—CLERGY STIPENDS.—QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the riotous proceedings lately enacted in Edinburgh, arising out of the seizure and sale of the furniture of certain citizens who refuse to pay that portion of the local rates which, under the name of Police Rate, is (under an Act passed in 1860) levied to pay the stipends of the city clergy; whether it is true that several thousand ratepayers have resolutely refused to pay that portion of the rate, and that the arrears of the several local rates collected along with this rate are accumulating so rapidly as to have reached nearly £20,000; and, whether it is the intention of Government to propose any alteration in the Law?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it was certainly not a fact that there existed any local rate under the name of Police Rate, or any other name, levied for the payment of the stipends of the clergy of the city of Edinburgh. Such a rate had been levied until the year 1860, under the name of the Annuity Tax, but an Act passed in that year provided that the ministers of Edinburgh, being reduced in number, should be paid not by a local rate at all, but by a general charge made upon the revenue of the city. That arrangement was made at the desire of the opponents of the Annuity Tax, for the express purpose of avoiding the imposition of an Ecclesiastical Tax. At the same time, the magistrates were empowered, by the Act of 1860, to levy an additional Police Rate for the supply of any deficiency which was, or might be, occasioned by the charge thus made upon the funds of the city, and the additional rate was, in all respects, a municipal charge for municipal purposes. No doubt some of the ratepayers, but not, he was glad to say, a large number, thought that, notwithstanding the municipal character of this additional rate, its payment was still open to conscientious objections. There was little doubt that on three or four occasions there had been some tumult occasioned by the sale of goods which had been seized for non-payment of the rate; but he had no official information excepting what had been communicated to him in a letter which he had received that day, from which he learnt that those proceedings had been very greatly exaggerated. The most conspicuous case was one in which the public were invited a few days before the event took place by means of handbills to attend and witness the sale of some furniture which had been seized. Under those circumstances, it was not at all extraordinary that a large rabble assembled, and that those engaged in carrying out the law were subject to much annoyance. After they had left, the rabble burnt one of the articles of furniture; but the inhabitants of the city themselves attached no importance to this incident. According to the information which he had received, the arrears consequent upon the refusal to pay the rate, amounted to about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  or 4 per cent upon the whole of the assessment. Usually 5 per cent was allowed as the amount which would cover the non-payments; so that in this instance the percentage would be increased to  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, which, upon a sum of £50,000, was hardly a matter worthy of much consideration. He could not tell the exact number of those who had refused to pay, but the average for the four years previous to 1860 had numbered 3,269, while the average of the four years since that date was 4,976, a difference of no great importance. In answer to the third part of the Question, he begged to say it was not the intention of the Government to propose any alteration in the law.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to know from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the date of the letter from which he derived his information, because he (Mr. Bright) had seen in the papers of that morning a statement to the effect that no less than 10,000 persons assembled on one of the occasions referred to in the Question of his hon. Friend?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he had received his letter that day. There was no allusion in it to the case to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, and the only information which he had received upon the subject was what had that morning been published in the newspapers.

METROPOLIS—SOUTH ENTRANCE TO PARK LANE.—QUESTION.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether some plan cannot be adopted to prevent the dangerous traffic that exists at Park Lane into Piccadilly, either by widening the street or causing some other way that the traffic may be diverted. He put the question to the right hon. Gentleman in consequence of an accident which occurred last Saturday when a cab was overturned by an omnibus. He believed Park Lane to be the most dangerous corner in London, and from inquiries which he had made of the inhabitants he had ascertained that an accident occurred there nearly every day. He wished to add to his Question an inquiry as to whether some of the Police could not be placed at the spot in order to assist in the regulation of the traffic?

MR. COWPER: Sir, the narrowness of Park Lane is manifestly and obviously the cause of great inconvenience and occasional danger. Whatever can be done by regulation of traffic is already accomplished by the presence of two policemen who are generally employed in preventing any obstruction.

GENERAL BUCKLEY: One of them told me that he had no orders.

MR. COWPER: I am afraid my hon. and gallant Friend must have fallen in with a policeman who was not on duty, as I am assured by the Commissioners of Police that one policeman is employed in preventing obstructions, while the other was at no great distance, who might be available if any particular obstruction arose. The real remedy is to be found either in widening Park Lane, or in having a new street through Hamilton Place. One thing I cannot admit is, that my hon. and gallant Friend has any right to address this question to me. Park Lane is not Crown property; therefore I would request my hon. and gallant Friend to address his Question to those who represent the Metropolitan Board of Works, whoever they may be, because Parliament having constituted a body who have special care over the streets and ways of the metropolis, I think it most proper that the representatives of that body should take this matter into their serious consideration, as the powers of taxation of that body enable them to widen the streets or make a new one, so as to enable the traffic to have a larger and wider outlet. There have been suggestions made that Hyde Park should be used for public vehicles instead of Park Lane. Now, to that I entirely demur, because, instead of getting rid of the inconvenience of the obstruction, it would simply divert it from one place to another. I think, indeed, that the inconvenience would be more severely felt at Hyde Park Corner, just where the carriages leave the Park, than at present. Having consulted the Commissioners of Police on the subject, they are of opinion that such a change would by no means either remove the danger or the inconvenience and obstruction; therefore to that alternative I must put a decided negative.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he could interfere in the matter?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am not the representative of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I would suggest that the hon. and gallant Member put his Question to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite).

MR. TITE: I have no right to answer for the Metropolitan Board of Works, or to speak authoritatively; but I am a member of the Board, and I can say that the matter has been under consideration. A good many local difficulties exist, but I hope in a short time we shall be able to overcome them. All I can say is that it is a subject of grave consideration, and we will do our best to remove the obstructions complained of.

THE KERTCH PRIZE MONEY.

QUESTION.

MR. J. C. EWART said, he wished to ask the Paymaster General, When the distribution of the Parliamentary Grant to the Troops concerned in the Kertch Expedition will take place?

MR. HUTT said, in reply, that in a few days the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital would be able to proceed with the distribution of the Prize Money. He could promise that the distribution should take place on or before the 1st of June next:

EDUCATION—THE REVISED CODE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether any instructions have been issued by the Committee demanding sixty attendances from night scholars before examination for Capitation Grant, instead of twenty-four attendances, the number fixed in Article 40 of the Revised Code?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, in reply, that no such instructions had been issued. The state of the case was this:—Under the Code of 1860 no Grant was payable to a night school unless it had been held on sixty occasions during the year, nor was any Grant payable in respect of the children unless they had attended fifty times. By the Revised Code two payments were made—2s. 6d. on attendance, and 5s. on examination—provided the scholars had attended twenty-four times. The 5s. was now paid for the examination of every scholar who attended twenty-four times, but the payment on attendance was not made unless the school had been open at least forty days—an arrangement the reasonableness of which he was sure his hon. Friend would be the first to admit.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to know at what date the alteration was made?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that no Minute on the subject had been laid on the table, but it was necessary that some amount of discretion should be left to the heads of the Department. It surely never could have been intended that a school should be open for twenty-four nights only. That would obviously be most improper, and a recurrence in this respect to the practice under the original Code was thought to be justifiable without placing a Minute upon so trifling a subject on the table.

EDUCATION — MINUTES OF MAY 19 AND MARCH 11.—QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the Return moved for by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) would render the first part of his (Mr. Adderley's) question unnecessary; but he wished to ask, Whether the Government will be prepared on the Monday after Whitsuntide to fix the day for discussing the Motion for the withdrawal of the Minutes of May 19 and March 11?

MR. H. A. BRUCE replied, that he would not be prepared, on the Monday after Whitsuntide, to fix the day for discussing the Motion in reference to the Committee of Council on Education. It would be obviously inconvenient to fix a day, but one would be fixed as soon as possible.

NAVY—THE IRON PLATE COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Iron Plate Committee are about to terminate their labours; and, if so, whether the Admiralty will have any objection to lay the Report of their proceedings on the table of the House?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that the Iron Plate Committee, as soon as they had terminated certain inquiries now being made, would cease to exist. With regard to their Report, there would be no objection whatever to its being furnished for the information of the House; but, inasmuch as it would consist of four bulky volumes, in which there were many hundreds of woodcuts, showing the results of the firing upon the plates, the shape of the shot, and various other particulars, he thought it would be hardly wise to go to the expense of printing them. What he proposed to do, therefore, was to lay six copies of the Report, which were now printed for the Committee, in the Library for reference by hon. Gentlemen; and if afterwards it was thought desirable, he should have no objection to print it for general use.

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN THE PARKS.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the Instructions to the Police as to Public Meetings in the Parks, Whether he considers such Instructions justify the suppression of Public Meetings other than such as may be held on a Sunday?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not think, Sir, that the letter of the Instructions issued to the Police authorizes them, without having recourse to the Commissioner or an Assistant Commissioner, in dispersing public meetings in the Parks, other than such as may be held on a Sunday. These Instructions had reference to an evil which had arisen, and which the public generally felt—that of meetings held in the Parks on Sundays, attended by large numbers of people, and followed by considerable tumult and disorder. But the public notice which was issued distinctly pointed to such meetings being held in the Parks on any day, and it is obvious that meetings of a political character, where different opinions are expressed, and where great disorder may arise, are equally objectionable on any day, interfering as they must with the object for which the Parks were designed—namely, the enjoyment and recreation of all classes of people.

BRAZIL—CASE OF MR. REEVES.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the mediation with Brazil, care will be taken to secure some redress for Mr. Reeves, a British subject, who has been deprived of a large sum of money in a lawsuit with a Brazilian; whether Her Majesty's Government have received information from the British Consul of Rio of the recent dismissal of seven of the Judges of the same tribunals for corruption, not connected with Mr. Reeves's case; and whether any step has yet been taken to punish the Under Secretary of the Brazilian Ministry of Justice, who wrote letters to the Judges asking them to vote against the Englishman, Mr. Reeves, and of whose conduct complaints were made by the British Minister, by order of Earl Russell?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that within the last two or three days, the Government had been officially informed that the Emperor of Brazil had accepted the mediation of the King of Portugal. It would be improper, and indeed, impossible, for him (Mr. Layard) to say what the exact terms of the mediation were, or how the relations between the two countries were to be restored; therefore he could not answer the first part of the Question. As all communication between the two Governments had for some time past been suspended, the Government had received no official account of the occurrence to which the second part of the hon. Gentleman's Question alluded.

UNITED STATES—MURDER OF THE MATE OF THE "SAXON."

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received the Report of the Court of Inquiry held on Acting Master Danenhoven or Donovan of the United States ship Vanderbilt, for the murder of Mr. James Gray, mate of the ship Saxon, at Angra Peguina, held at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, with the finding thereof; also the proceedings of the Court Martial subsequently held upon him, with the remarks of the Secretary to the Navy of the United States, and the Correspondence of Lord Lyons on the subject; and, if so, whether he will lay the Papers upon the table of the House?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that an inquiry had taken place, and this was followed by a court-martial. The inquiry was a private one, and the proceedings had not been published, nor had the result been communicated to the Government. With regard to the court-martial the Foreign Office had received from time to time a report of the proceedings, but they had not yet received any official account of the verdict. Of course the Consul at New York would have to communicate with Lord Lyons, but he presumed that the Government would shortly receive official records of the whole trial. He should then be able to inform the hon. Gentleman whether the papers were such as could be laid upon the table.

EDUCATION (INSPECTORS' REPORTS).

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he regretted to inform the House that his noble Friend at the head of the Government was unable to attend that evening to make the Motion of which he had given notice on the subject of the Inspectors' Reports. In his absence he would, with the permission of the House, move that the Orders of the day be postponed till after the notice of Motion relative to the Inspectors' Reports.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Notice of Motion relative to Education (Inspectors' Reports).
—(Sir George Grey.)

SIR GEORGE GREY moved that the Resolution passed by the House on the 12th of April last, with reference to the Reports of the School Inspectors, should be read at the table.

Resolution [12th April] read—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the mutilation of the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and the exclusion from them of statements and opinions adverse to the educational views entertained by the Committee of Council, while matter favourable to them is admitted, are violations of the understanding under which the appointment of the Inspectors was originally sanctioned by Parliament, and tend entirely to destroy the value of their Reports."

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I moved that the Resolution of the 12th of April, adopted by this House, be read, in order that it may appear on our records that the Motion which I am now about to make has a direct and an immediate reference to that Resolution. That Resolution asserts, or rather assumes, as a matter of fact, that the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools have been mutilated, and that they have been mutilated with the distinct object of withholding from the House the opinions of those Inspectors when they were adverse to the views entertained by the Committee of Council on Education, and of presenting them to the House when they were favourable to those views. A graver charge than that could hardly be made against any Department of a Government. It is true that, at the time, that charge was met by a clear and emphatic denial on the part of my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe); but the House, acting, as we believe, under a misapprehension of the real facts of the case, and influenced to a certain extent by information which was in the possession of some hon. Members of the House, though not in the possession of the House itself, nor in the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government, adopted the condemnatory Resolution. We further believe that if the information to which I allude had been in the hands of my right hon. Friend at the time, it was capable of and would have received a satisfactory explanation that would have deprived it of the weight which, without that explanation, was attached to it. My right hon. Friend subsequently made a statement to this House which I believe was entirely satisfactory. As for his personal honour, no one can doubt that it has been fully vindicated; but the matter rests in this position. There remains on our records, and there will be inserted on the Journals of this House, and remain on those Journals a Resolution, adopted by this House without any qualification — a Resolution conveying a grave and serious censure on a Department of the Government which we hold to be unmerited; while the subsequent statement of my right hon. Friend, and the manner in which it was received by the House, will be only found in those daily records which have not a permanent existence, and which after a time will be forgotten. My noble Friend the President of the Council, taking upon himself that full share of the responsibility which belongs to him as head of the Department, the proceedings of which have been impugned by the Resolution, and his Colleagues in the Government, think it due to the Department that those charges which have been brought against it, and which were assumed to have been established, should be subjected to the rigid inquiry of a Committee of this House, in order that it may be ascertained by means of that inquiry whether those charges have any foundation. I am not going to allude to what is the practice of the Department. I am not going to defend it by any considerations of public policy or by reference to the practice of other Departments; these are matters which will be inquired into by the Committee; but I may express my conviction that if the result of the inquiry I ask for should be to show that the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with reference to the Reports of these Inspectors may be justified, and is not in any way open to the construction put upon it by the Resolution of the House, in such case the House will agree to record the opinion so expressed by its Committee. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Parkinson) has given notice of an Amendment to my Motion, by way of adding to it certain words which would greatly enlarge the scope of the inquiry. If this Amendment be adopted the inquiry, instead of being confined to the topics to which I propose to direct it, would comprise within its range matters altogether foreign to the specific and limited objects I have in view. The right hon. Gentleman proposes an inquiry into the constitution of the Committee of Council, and into the question how far their mode of conducting the business of the Department is consistent with the due control of Parliament over the annual education grants. That is a proposition which might very fairly be submitted to this House, and to which, if brought forward as a substantive Motion, the House might, if it thought fit, very fairly give its sanction. I am far from expressing an opinion on the question whether such a wide inquiry might or might not be made; but this I cannot help feeling—that such an inquiry ought to be proposed by means of a substantive and distinct Motion. The proposal ought to be brought before the House on its own merits, and considered separately and distinctly from the subject of the inquiry which is proposed by the Motion which I am about to submit to the House. Those intrusted with the conduct of the Education Department have a right to the calm and deliberate judgment of the House as to whether these charges can be substantiated or not; and what I ask the House to do is to inquire into that matter without at all prejudging the inquiry proposed to be brought forward by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich. I therefore hope the House will not allow the inquiry I ask for to be swamped and overlaid by this new inquiry, which will prevent an early expression of opinion on the question we propose to have tried—namely, Whether the charges and imputations of the Resolutions of the 12th of April are well founded? I hope the House will limit the present inquiry to that object, and will not allow it to be mixed up with a vague and general inquiry which probably would last through the Session, and render it impossible to obtain an early expression of opinion on the definite issue now in hand.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, before I proceed to offer an explanation of the reasons which induce me to move for a very considerable extension of the limits of the inquiry which has just been moved for by the right hon. Baronet, there are one or two points to which I am desirous of being allowed to refer, in order to prevent any misunderstanding of my Motion. In the first place, I wish to state that I have no intention in the Motion I am about to make to embarrass or impede the inquiry for which the right hon. Gentleman has moved. There are many Members in this House, and I am one of them, who are desirous for this inquiry, and, as has been justly stated by the right hon. Baronet, the tenour of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), when he explained the reasons of his resignation, was such as to deserve, as it received, the sympathy and good feeling of the House; and I really do not believe, referring to what has been said by the right hon. Baronet, there was a man in this House—I am quite sure I may say this for my noble Friend the Member for Stamford—who, in supporting the Resolution of the 12th of April, had the slightest idea that he was calling in question the personal honour of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. I am bound in truth, however, to say that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to the interference with Inspectors' Reports in the Education Office, was not satisfactory to my mind, or removed from it the desire for an inquiry, because the right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech mentioned to the House, for the first time, that which we had no previous knowledge nor idea of—namely, that in the month of January, 1861, a Minute was passed by the Office, in which he was Vice President, restricting in the most material degree the Reports of those Inspectors. If there were no other reason on my part for desiring this inquiry, I should desire that the Minute passed three years ago, but of which this House never heard a word till they were told of it in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and the policy of that Minute, should be the subject of investigation. There are many hon. Gentlemen in this House—hon. Gentlemen who have given great attention to the education of the people—who will agree with me that there is no information on this subject so valuable, none given with so much ability, and for the most part with such impartiality, as the information contained in those Reports of the Inspectors. I should view with extreme disinclination and jealousy any change of policy on the part of the Education Office which would limit, as curtailment would limit, the information which those Inspectors have been accustomed to give the House and the country. And let me say that, should the House think fit to adopt the Amendment which I am about to move, it would be my proposal that the first subject to be considered by the Committee should be that of the Inspectors' Reports, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the difficulty which he suggests may be entirely removed before the Committee proceeds to consider the larger question which I propose for its consideration—it should present its views to this House on the Reports of the Education Inspectors. There is another point on which I wish to avoid any misunderstanding. In bringing forward this Amendment, I am acting without any discourtesy towards, or any want of confidence in, the right hon. Gentleman who has lately assumed and now fills the office of Vice President. On the contrary, I beg to say, with the utmost sincerity, that within the range of the Gentleman opposite to me I doubt if the noble Viscount the Prime Minister could have made a choice which I could have thought more satisfactory or more hopeful; and if there is a man in the House who, more than another, ought to support me, and who ought to feel grateful for what I suggest, it is the right hon. Gentleman. Neither is it my desire to cast any censure on the late Vice President. If I had brought forward the subject a few weeks ago, there are matters on which I should have questioned his conduct and administration; but the fact is, the explanations and disclosure which have been made in this House within the last few weeks have made me entirely doubtful as to the quarter on which the blame of those transactions rests. There is no doubt that a deep feeling of dissatisfaction and distrust of the administration of the Educational Department prevails throughout the country. Whether the fault be with the President or the Vice President, or with the President and the Vice President together, or with that mysterious body who are spoken of in every letter as “my Lords,” or with the Secretary who signs my Lords’ letters, or writes their letters for them, I am at a loss to determine; and it is one of those questions as to which I ask the House to institute an inquiry. I approach the subject solely with a view to promote the interests of education in this country. I ask the Government and hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House whether they can say that the present mode of administering the annual grant is exactly what they would wish it to be? Can any reasonable cause be assigned why the Department should be constituted on principles which differ from those of every other Department of the State, and which in every other Department have been long exploded and abandoned. Under our Parliamentary system, it is the object and desire of the country that at the head of each Department there should be a man whose time, attention, and mind are concentrated on it, and who has full control over it, subject only to the general check of the Cabinet and of the responsibility which he owes to Parliament. That is the system under which the great Departments of State are administered; but what is the state of affairs in the Education Office? In the Education Department there are eight or ten Ministers instead of one, and as to responsibility, there is none. The Board is composed of the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Earl Russell, the Premier, the President of the Poor Law Board, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Vice President. Nothing could illustrate more completely the confusion of management than the fact that the right hon. Member for Calne, in the course of three or four sentences of his speech the other evening, spoke first of Earl Granville as the head of the Office, then of himself, and a little while after he spoke of the Committee of “My Lords,” as they are called, as being the heads. The Board is a very hydra, in fact.

Now as to the circumstances under which this body exists. In the year 1855, when the subject of education was very much discussed, I and other Members as well suggested to Earl Russell that there should be a responsible Minister of Education in this House. Earl Russell, in withdrawing his Bill on the subject of education, intimated that the Government were willing to accede to that suggestion. On that occasion he used these words—

“When that Committee (of Education) was appointed he did not think that any better means could be adopted for managing the Educational Votes than by intrusting the control of them to a council of several Ministers; but circumstances had since changed, and he thought it would be for the benefit of the public service if the President of the Committee of Council were to be acknowledged as the Minister of Education, and that the Department of Education should be represented in that House by a person who might, perhaps, hold the rank of a Privy Councillor, and who might be able to defend any measure that might be adopted.” [3 Hansard, cxxxix. 386.]

I did not infer from those words that it was the noble Earl’s intention that the action of the Committee of Council should be carried on simultaneously with that of the new Minister. At the commencement of 1856 a Bill was introduced by Earl Granville in the House of Lords; and in the debate upon it some of the most distinguished statesmen of the country—the Earl of Derby, Earl Grey, the Earl of Ellenborough, Lord Monteagle, and the Marquess of Lansdowne—took part. They were unanimous in their approval of the appointment of an Education Minister, but the Marquess of Lansdowne was the only one who expressed any approbation—and that very faint—of the mode in which it was proposed to constitute the office. The Earl of Derby said—

“But if the time had arrived for charging a responsible Minister with the duties of instruction, it appeared to him well worthy of consideration whether it would not be well to supersede the Privy Council altogether in this matter, and to have a Minister at the head of a Department, who should have no other duties to perform, and who should be, in fact, responsible for the education of the people.” [3 Hansard, xli. 815.]

Those are the views which I myself entertain. The Earl of Ellenborough said—

“If they wished to have a department well conducted, they should rather place it in the hands of one than of two Ministers, however able; and he certainly did hope that this Bill was intended to delegate all the duties connected with education substantially to the one officer who was to represent the Board in the House of Commons. It was quite enough work for one man, and that work never would be well done till it was confided to one man only.” [Ibid. 819.]

Earl Grey said—

“He concurred in the opinion that it would be better to dissociate the Presidency of Council from the superintendence of the Educational Department.” [Ibid. 821.]

And Lord Monteagle said—

“He rejoiced that Government had at last dealt with this important question; he could not, however, approve of the proposed plan. A Board or Committee of Education, as appointed under the old system, was in principle and constitution one of the worst modes of administration.” [Ibid. 816.]

After condemning the Board of Trade and Board of Control as precedents, he went on—

“As far as he could discover, these Boards were liable to be really represented by subordinate persons, all true responsibility being lost; and, however desirous the Board might be of discharging its duty, wrong measures would be adopted and carried into effect, from the nature of which it would be apparent that the Board was not represented by the nominal head of the Department, but by its subordinate officers.” [Ibid. 817.]

I will call also another witness—the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was not then in office, but who sat on one of those elevated seats which are sometimes resorted to by servants out of place. The right hon. Gentleman, however, at that time felt it his business to criticize somewhat severely all the measures that proceeded from the Government of that day, of which the noble Viscount now at the head of the Administration was also Premier. On the third reading of the Bill the present Chancellor of the Exchequer attacked the measure in its entirety, and took grave objections to the appointment of the Education Minister. I am thankful that the right hon. Gentleman did not then succeed in his objections, but there was one point urged by the right hon. Gentleman in which I entirely concurred. The language of the right hon. Gentleman then was to this effect—

“They had some analogous institutions to which they might refer. The Board of Trade was one of them. He did not, however, hesitate to say that the constitution of that Department was a bad constitution. Instead of being a Department with a regular organization and one responsible head, and the other members bearing a defined relation in subordination to him, they had two parties, cheek by jowl—a President and a Vice President, of equal official rank, the Vice President being, in fact, the more important man of the two, especially if he happened to sit in that House while the President sat in the House of Lords.” [3 Hansard, xli. 1212.]

The authority of the right hon. Gentleman is high, and I think that the objection which he made to the President and Vice President sitting “cheek by jowl,” so far as the Board of Trade is concerned, applies exactly, or with still greater force, to the constitution of the Education Department. Having quoted the opinions of the most eminent and distinguished men on the subject, I would further ask the House whether their prophecies have not to a great extent been realized by the result. I now wish to call the attention of hon. Members to the language which was used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne a short time since. In reply to some observations of my noble Friend the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), the right hon. Gentleman said—

“The noble Lord did me too much honour in attributing to me the undivided management and responsibility of what he calls the Educational revolution that has taken place during the last three years. I am but the humble instrument of much higher authorities, and all these changes have been submitted to the Educational Committee, composed of the highest officers of the State, under whose directions I have to act. I should be tempted to take to myself—if I were worthy of it—all the responsibility and the blame for what has been done. . . . It matters very little to the House what my opinions on this subject may be, but I can assure it that in what I have had to do with regard to education I have looked upon it as a matter of business in a department which I have had to administer under principals. All my efforts have been directed to carrying out the directions I have received from my official superiors in the manner most calculated to attain the end they had in view." [3 Hansard, clxxiii. 1865.]

I think the spirit which induced the right hon. Gentleman to take upon his own shoulders blame in the matter is a spirit worthy of a British Minister, and if I find fault with him it is for having condescended to accept—and the same observation applies to his successor—office on conditions so humiliating. But the right hon. Gentleman having expressed these very strong views was shortly after assailed by a Motion questioning the conduct of the Education Department with regard to the Reports of the Inspectors, and the result of such Motion was that he resigned. Now, holding the opinions which he did, and seeing that he was simply acting as a subordinate, I do not think it was he who ought to have resigned, but rather Earl Granville, the head of the Department. This brings me to what occurred on Saturday last, when, as we are informed by the newspapers, there was a gathering of those great officers who compose the Committee of Council. I find there were then in attendance the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the President of the Poor Law Board, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Vice President of the Department. In addition to all these was the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department. Now the name of the right hon. Baronet had not appeared in the list of the members of the Educational Department which I have read to the House. But in these days of volunteer movement I suppose we must look upon the right hon. Gentleman as a volunteer in aid of the Educational Department of the Government. In my humble judgment, however, the duties of this Department would be far more efficiently discharged by the President and Vice President of the Board of Education than they are at all likely to be under the authority or guidance of so large a number of men, however eminent or distinguished they may be in the government of the country. But, be that as it may, these dignitaries it may be supposed held a sort of coroner's inquest over the dead body of the Endowment Minute, and, if they did, it may very well be imagined that the verdict given by the Vice President would be, "Found drowned." Then comes the question, What were the circumstances under which these distinguished persons met? Saturday was a day on which a critical meeting of the Conference was approaching. A general belief existed that the question of peace or war was hanging in the balance. We may well imagine that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was considering how the expenses of that war were to be defrayed, and that the First Lord of the Admiralty was counting up his iron ships. ["Question, question!"] I venture to tell those hon. Gentlemen who interrupt me that I am speaking to the question in adverting to the arrangement by which these great officers of State are brought together to attend to the details of the Education Question, and I would confidently ask what business had they, whose minds must be occupied by the gravest subjects, to assemble to decide upon points with regard to an endowment scheme which it is pretty well known the country will not stand? I may add that I am not altogether without personal experience in these matters. I had the honour myself in a former Government of being a member of this Committee of Council, and that Government acted, I think, more wisely and more prudently than the present Government appear to have done. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen will admit that it is only natural I should hold that opinion, and I feel they will concur with me, at all events, so far as relates to the point we are now discussing, when I tell them that I can remember only one occasion on which we met together as members of the Council, and that the impression then created was that we were interfering with the business of other men who could do it better. The experiment was not accordingly repeated, and it was left to my right hon. Friend near me and the President of the Council to discharge the whole duties of the Office. I would further remind the House that the Board of Trade is far better constituted, in two important respects, than the Education Department, one being that the President of the former can devote the whole of his time to the business of his office, whereas the President of the Committee of Council has other important duties to perform. I concur, I may add, with Earl Grey that, for the most obvious reasons, it is unwise that the Lord President of the Council should, in conjunction with his other offices, hold that of head of the Education Department. What is more important is that, although there is a long list of high officers of State who form what is called the Committee of Council on Trade, they have long ceased to act, and the business of the Board is left entirely in the hands of the President and Vice President. The Board of Control has also been mentioned as a precedent; but I submit that it is no precedent whatever. There were certain high officers who were said to form the Board of Control; the fact, however, is, that they never meet now, nor have they ever met for the last thirty or forty years. Perhaps some hon. Members may quote the Board of Admiralty as an example. The constitution of that Board, though much disapproved of, has this advantage. There is a responsible Minister at the head of it, and the Board does not consist of a number of persons with other avocations or duties to attend to. I think I have now shown the House that there are grave theoretical objections to this Education Department as it stands. Let me now ask whether its working has been such as to reconcile us to the existence of these theoretical objections. I will not enter into any argument upon those questions which have lately been the subject of debate in this House, but will only advert to such points as illustrate the working of the Department. And, first, let me refer to the Revised Code which occupied so much of our attention two years ago. Whatever were the merits or demerits of that Code, the House and the country had a right to regard that Code as expressing the deliberate opinion of the Education Office upon the subjects to which it refers, and as, so far as the Government is concerned, a final settlement of the questions with which it deals. It was so accepted by the House. Under these circumstances it is a remarkable evidence of how this Department works that, within a year from that settlement, a Minute was laid upon the table which entirely departed from the principles on which the Revised Code was founded. That Code proposed to settle the question of endowments; but within twelve months of its adoption a Minute was laid upon the table which reversed all that the Code had said upon the subject, and was of such a character as to agitate the country from one end to the other. If the Education Department had been under the guidance of a single man, acting under a full sense of responsibility, that subject would never have been treated with the carelessness and levity which led to such a result. The next proof of the unsatisfactory working of this Department is the course taken last year as to supplementary rules. In September, 1863, a series of supplementary rules were published, of which this House, in its Parliamentary capacity, knows nothing, but which were entirely at variance not only with the Revised Code, but with the Report of the President and Vice President of the Committee of Council presented to the Queen in 1862. In that Report it was intimated that the children would be presented for examination "according to standards selected for them in the first instance by those interested in their success," while, by the ninth of the supplementary rules, it is announced that "a deduction of at least one-tenth will be made from the grant to a school, unless one class be presented above standard 3." And another rule goes so far as to enact that no grant will be paid unless one class be presented as high as standard 3. I listened with great interest to hear the answer of the right hon. Gentleman to the question this evening of the hon. Member for Bradford, in regard to the statement current throughout the country in reference to the night schools. I was, however, very glad to learn that, although a considerable change has been made with respect to night schools, it is not so extensive and objectionable as the public has been led to suppose. These changes have produced in the country an impression, that the present Administration is indifferent to the promotion of the education of the people. I have no right to make such a charge, but the effect of each of these vexatious charges has been to diminish the amount of the grant, and the impression unhappily does prevail that the present Government care much more about the reduction of the grant than about the promotion of education. The grant this year will be very much less than it was last year; but while the grant has been reduced, and there has been a moderate increase in the number of schools and scholars, the expenses of the office have greatly increased. Since 1860 the schools have advanced from 7,272 to 7,739, and the children from 996,832 to 1,107,354; but in the same time the number of Inspectors has increased from 62 to 84, and their salaries from £24,075 to £32,650. I know no more valuable service that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President could render in the new office which he has undertaken than that of advising the adoption of some mode by which the central action of the Department should be supported by local action in the various provinces of the country. There is only one other subject to which I desire to refer, but it is one to which I wish to draw the serious attention of the House. It is a point in respect to which I think an absolute necessity exists for some alteration. I refer to the system according to which the Education Minutes are now laid upon the table of this House, and the sanction of Parliament is asked to the various changes which take place in this Department. The House will remember the feeling which was excited by the manner in which the Revised Code was laid upon the table, on, I think, the very last day of the Session of 1861. In the following Session that Code was discussed, and certain articles were agreed to, with the sole view of guarding the House against sudden surprise in future. One of those articles is to the effect that, before any change can be acted upon, full particulars respecting it shall be laid before the House at least one month. I must candidly say that, after consulting with several of my friends who are competent to give an opinion upon the construction of Minutes of this kind, there is a difference in their views as to the precise meaning of those two articles, but I think it is a great evil that articles intended for the security of the House should have been worded in such a manner as to create difference of opinion as to their construction. My own view of these articles is, that it was intended that no Minute should be submitted to Parliament during the Session, but at the commencement of each year: whatever change it might have been thought necessary to introduce, should be embodied in the new Code, and be laid upon the table for the sanction of Parliament. Of course it cannot be expected that we are to have an education debate every month, but if the course which it appears to me was intended to be taken is adopted, the House will be made aware of all the changes that have been made, and will be called upon to sanction or reject them after due consideration. I am sorry to have detained the House so long upon what I know must be to many a very dry and unattractive question, but still it is a question of very great importance. I think experience has shown us that the present constitution of that office is at variance with the precedents of other Departments, and is objectionable as raising doubts whether blame should be cast upon this man or upon that man. You cannot expect a Department consisting of eight or ten different statesmen, and so arranged that it is impossible to say to whom responsibility attaches, you cannot expect that such a Department will satisfactorily conduct the affairs of an office having to deal with a subject so complicated. Wherever the fault may lie it cannot be denied that a feeling of irritation and annoyance has been created throughout the country. That is an evil, but by changing the constitution of the office I think much may be done to counteract that evil. I have now to move the addition to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman of the words of which I have given notice, and it is in no spirit of personal attack or censure that I propose this Amendment, but with a view of doing what I have ever desired, contributing to the improvement and extension of education among the people.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and further to inquire into the constitution of that Committee, and how far their mode of conducting the business of the department is consistent with the due control of Parliament over the annual Education Grants."—(Sir John Pakington.)

Mr. H. A. BRUCE said, that although the right hon. Gentleman had in his remarks disarmed his proposition of its most objectionable feature — that of causing delay in the proposed inquiry, yet he thought he should be able to show sufficient reasons why the Amendment should not be adopted by the House. At the very threshold lay the question of the constitution of the Committee. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the practice of the Committee of Council as to Reports. That was a definite subject of inquiry, and in the selection of a Committee to consider it, men conversant with official business would be chosen, with special reference to their capability of giving an opinion on the subject of inquiry. But the subject that would be submitted to the Committee, if the Amendment were adopted, would be much wider and larger than an inquiry into the practice of the Privy Council, with reference to the Reports of Inspectors; and to deal with it properly, men must be selected to represent various opinions and various interests. An inquiry based upon the proposition of the right hon. Baronet would, in fact, be an inquiry into the constitution of the Education Department affecting different religious bodies, and a variety of interests, and would raise questions of great delicacy and difficulty. The Committee, therefore, must be constituted on an entirely different principle. That objection alone proved the extreme inconvenience which would follow the adoption of the Amendment. But, apart from that, he ventured to say that the right hon. Baronet had misapprehended, and therefore had misrepresented the actual state of the case as regarded the Education Department. The right hon. Baronet had stated that the government of that Department rested with the Committee of Council. From that proposition he (Mr. H. A. Bruce) entirely dissented. The Committee of Council was first appointed in 1839, and superintended the application of the insignificant sum then voted by Parliament to promote public education in Great Britain. The members of that Committee were appointed individually, and at every change of Government by Order in Council. From 1839 to 1856 the affairs of the office were administered by the Committee, and then, indeed, the Department was open to the objection urged by the right hon. Baronet against the existing state of things, of a want of distinct responsibility. The dissatisfaction which prevailed led to an alteration, and an Order in Council was made in February, 1856, which was as follows:—

"The Lords of your Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council beg leave humbly to recommend to your Majesty that the education establishments now attached to different departments be united under one direction, and be represented in both Houses of Parliament; and for this purpose their Lordships beg leave humbly to recommend to your Majesty that, for the future, the establishment to be called the Education Department be placed under the Lord President of the Council, assisted by a member of the Privy Council, who shall be called the Vice President of the Committee of the said Privy Council on Education, and shall act under the direction of the Lord President, and shall act for him in his absence."

From that time till the discussion of the Revised Code, a Committee of Council had rarely sat, and none had sat that had not been summoned by the Lord President, and he would undertake to say that there had been no binding necessity for any Committee to be summoned. In 1857 the first Vice President was appointed, but the Act did not define his powers, and the question was in what light was that appointment viewed at the time it was first made. The Vice President was intended at that time to be a responsible officer, and the House practically regarded him as such. In moving the Education Estimates for the last time in 1856, the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary said—

"The responsibility of individual members of the Committee of Privy Council I fully admit; but then that Committee is only summoned occasionally, and then to discuss questions of principle and not of detail. If, however, there were a department in which responsibility should be concentrated, represented by a Minister in this House, who would necessarily be acquainted with all the details of the subject, I think we should derive the same advantage as followed, in regard to the administration of the Poor Law, by having the President of the Poor Law Board in this House; and I believe that there will be a similar advantage in regard to education by the alteration proposed by the measure I refer to."

In consequence of the Act of 1856, the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works was appointed Vice President of the Council, and upon the occasion of the Education Estimates being moved in 1857, the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) stated that—

"He must also state that he derived great pleasure from the fact that the Vote for educational purposes had been submitted to the notice of the Committee by a Minister directly connected with the Department of Education in this country, and who must be held responsible for the various items which the Vote contained."

No alteration had since that period been made either as regarded the law or the practice, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) at what period the alteration of which he complained had taken place, and when the Vice President had ceased to be responsible? The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works was succeeded in office by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley), whose energy and ability in the conduct of his office were admitted on all sides. He would ask any hon. Member who remembered the right hon. Gentleman in office, whether the slightest doubt ever presented itself to his mind as to the responsibility incurred by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the measures which he submitted to the House? He was in turn succeeded in office by his right

hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), and it seemed almost absurd for him to ask the House whether or not his right hon. Friend was held responsible during his five years of office for the conduct of his Department. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had quoted words made use of by his right hon. Friend, and, taken apart from the circumstances under which they were uttered, the inference which he drew from them might be correct. But it should be remembered that the policy which had been pursued by the Education Office had long been attributed to the idiosyncrasy and to the political proclivities of his right hon. Friend; and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) had told them on a recent occasion, that his measures betrayed his adhesion to the principles of the hon. Members for Leeds and Sheffield. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire said, during the same debate, that he perceived in the measures of the late Vice President indications of a mind dissatisfied with its employment—in fact, the restless turnings of an ambitious and discontented spirit. His right hon. Friend, while admitting that he was responsible for the measures which he submitted, reminded the House that those measures had received the consideration of others besides himself, and that they would not have been submitted to the House if they had not received the approval of experienced statesmen, who were not only Members of the Committee of Council, but were also Members of the Cabinet. The right hon. Gentleman would have an opportunity of speaking for himself; but considering that it was he who practically administered the funds voted by that House for education, and that it was through his hands the whole business of the office passed, he (Mr. Bruce) was sure he need not appeal to him to say whether he did not consider himself responsible.

There was, doubtless, much advantage in bringing under the consideration of statesmen of experience the new and delicate subjects connected with the administration of the Education Department. There was an advantage in consulting many minds, which could be done without eluding, or seeking to elude, the responsibility which attached to the Ministers presiding over the Department. The right hon. Baronet was far too experienced a statesman to object to the constitution of the Board, unless he could point out some practical evil arising from that constitution. Many changes had been effected during the last few years, which had been received with censure or approbation; but who had ever imputed their origin to the want of a responsible Minister? The first great labour was the compilation of the Code which contained the Minutes of previous years, in a short and intelligible form. Soon after the publication of the Government Code, the Commission on Education was appointed. The Report of that Commission pointed out many defects in the existing system, and it became the imperative duty of the Department to consider them. The changes were subsequently brought before the House in the Revised Code, which undoubtedly affected the interests of great numbers, including managers of schools, schoolmasters, &c.; and a great clamour was raised throughout the country. The subject was fully discussed, and the system as now in operation adopted. He would be glad to know what evidence of weakness or defective responsibility was exhibited in carrying these changes into effect? One of the arguments used by the right hon. Baronet was, that there was not sufficient financial control. Had the expenditure been found to increase, and the education given should be of an inferior character, the House might resolve that the Department had been a failure. Considering, however, that during the past five years the average number of scholars attending the national schools had increased from 748,000 to 969,000, and that the expenditure had not only not increased but had decreased by about £100,000, it was fair to assume that the reverse was the fact. The former imperfect and unsatisfactory inspections had been replaced under the present system by examinations, which tested the character of education and apportioned the amount of the grant according to the progress made. He asked again, then, in which of these important respects had the Department failed to discharge the duties imposed upon it? The grant itself was now more immediately under the control of the House than before. It was previously spread over fifteen subjects of a complicated and difficult nature. The number of subjects was now reduced to six, and the House had not the slightest difficulty in rectifying any error. Every year the Estimates were laid before the House by a responsible Minister, and he wanted to know in what respect the financial control was less over that sum than over any other sum voted by the House. The point which the right hon. Gentleman adduced as being the gravest blot in the system of the Educational Department was the conduct of that Department with respect to the Minutes affecting endowments. The right hon. Gentleman said that the proposal to change the practice with reference to endowment would never have been made if there had been a responsible Minister. He, on the other hand, believed that any responsible Minister, on ascertaining the results of that practice, would have done as the late Vice President had done, and hastened to lay those results before the House, and have asked them to join with him in procuring the alteration of the system. What was the practice with respect to endowments before the introduction of the Revised Code? It was the custom to withhold the grant in all cases where the endowment amounted to 30*s.* If, however, it fell short of that amount, even by one shilling, and the ordinary conditions of the grant were fulfilled, the grant of 9*s.* would be paid by the Privy Council Office, making the entire receipts of the school at least 47*s.* per head—a sum far in excess of the amount required for the purposes of education. Within the last few days a case had been brought to the knowledge of the Government, showing that the late Minute had tended to encourage lavish expenditure. In Hereford there had been two schools, possessing endowments respectively of £120 and £130, which received grants from the State of £102 in one case, and £130 in the other. The first impulse of the managers was to petition against the Minute of May last; but, subsequently, they thought better of it, and applied themselves to make good the requisite amount from fees and subscriptions, and with such success that they absolutely secured more than they previously acquired from the State. Here was an instance in a small cathedral town of two schools upon which there had been a useless waste of nearly £250. Was it possible for any Minister, especially one personally responsible for the administration of funds, to refrain from bringing such facts under the notice of the House? The right hon. Gentleman complained of the mode in which the Minutes and supplementary rules were published. But how did he connect that circumstance with the non-existence of the single responsible Minister whom he desired to see? The supplementary rules were, in fact, a number of complicated regulations made at the request and for the assistance of managers and schoolmasters throughout the country. If those rules were not in accordance with the language and spirit of the Minute, let it be shown, and let the earliest opportunity be taken of eliciting the sense of the House. But, in his opinion, no instructions to Inspectors or supplemental rules had ever been prepared without an honest desire on the part of the Department to conform in every way to that Minute. It would be highly inconvenient to include in the Code the immense number of administrative rules and instructions necessary to carry on the complicated work intrusted to the Department; at least, if that were done, the Code, instead of being tolerably short and intelligible, would very soon be thrown back into that state of confusion from which it emerged some four or five years ago. He felt bound to deprecate the spirit of suspicion with which every act of the Department was viewed, and he begged the House to believe that the Department was administered by men of honour and integrity, who had no pleasure in annoying managers by petty economies and vexatious regulations, and no desire to break faith with the House by travelling out of the regulations laid down for their guidance. It was sometimes hard to define the exact distinction between a Minute and a regulation; but if it were shown that the Committee of Council had violated the article which proscribed that new Minutes making material alterations in the Code should be laid on the table of the House, care should be taken to rectify an involuntary error. Having thus noticed the principal points brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman, he had only to say that he objected to his Amendment—first, because it implied a censure upon the constitution of the Committee of Council; and next, because the right hon. Gentleman had failed to show any ground for the large inquiry he proposed. He had further failed to show that there was any want of responsibility on the part of the Minister representing the Department in the House, or that any good would arise from the more direct responsibility which he wished to establish. And the House, he was sure, was too practical to direct an inquiry without some evil was first pointed out, and some remedy for that evil suggested. The Department was still carrying out large changes, necessarily exciting uneasiness and jealousy in many quarters; and if at such a time an inquiry were made into the constitution of the Department, expectations as to changes would be excited, which must interfere with the efficient management of schools throughout the country.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that thinking it exceedingly desirable that the House should dispose of that little matter before dinner, he would not enter into any of the questions connected with the Revised Code or the supplementary rules which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Privy Council had discussed. All he desired to do was to state the reasons why he preferred the words of his right hon. Friend to those of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Department, in effect, said, "After three or four discussions we have been brought before the House of Commons and condemned. From that condemnation we appeal to the more formal, more exact, and more laborious tribunal of a Committee of the House of Commons." No proposal could be fairer; and so desirous was he to aid their appeal, that he wished the inquiry to be full, free, and untrammelled. But the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down commenced his speech with the startling announcement that the Committee was to be composed of officials. The question being one between the House of Commons and the Department charged with official misconduct in having tried to carry on its functions without giving to the House that information which it had a right to expect, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to try the guilt or innocence of the Department by a Committee of the nature referred to. He could imagine nothing more pleasant than a coterie of officials, assembled for the purpose of inquiring whether officials were to be blamed. The terms of reference, however, were even more important than the constitution of the Committee. If it turned out that no offence had been committed, the terms the Government proposed were ample. But suppose the Committee found that an offence had been committed, they would want to know, not merely the crime, but the culprit, and thus it would become necessary to inquire into the constitution of the Department. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) gave an explanation of his conduct the other night which, as far as he was personally concerned, in the opinion of every one who heard him, must have entirely cleared his honour. The right hon. Gentleman said that certain marks, on which great stress was laid, and by which it was proved, or thought to be proved, that the Department ordered the Inspectors to mutilate their own Reports, had been affixed without his knowledge; and, for reasons peculiar to himself, the fact of their having been affixed remained unknown to him. But the Lord President Earl Granville must have read the Reports and seen the marks; and the same observation applied to Mr. Lingen, the permanent secretary. They must both have known perfectly well that the Reports were sent back to Inspectors to expurgate those marked passages to which the Committee of Council objected. If the blame did not fall properly upon the Vice President, he (Lord Robert Cecil) wanted to know whether it fell on the Lord President or the permanent secretary of the Department. The right hon. Gentleman told them that since 1862 Inspectors had never been ordered to expurgate passages which were indicated to them from their Reports. But he held in his hand evidence that exactly the contrary had taken place. As recently as last November a Report was sent back to an Inspector with special passages marked out, and he was ordered to expurgate his Report in that respect. On a former occasion he had been unable to quote the evidence which he relied upon, because he felt afraid of exposing particular Inspectors to the vengeance of the Department; but now he had a pamphlet from an Inspector upon whom the Department had done its worst. Mr. Morell had been dismissed, and had naturally betrayed the secrets of the prison-house. I find that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the other night, although in intention absolutely true, was still in fact absolutely false. Mr. Morell last autumn gave in a Report respecting a school in the country, in which the following passage occurs:—

"The premises and fittings are good; but an infants' school-room would be a great improvement. The discipline is good, and the instruction, though not very forward, is accurate and appropriate, as far as it goes, and as advanced as can be expected, considering how recently the present teachers have been in charge."

Now, that remark drew attention to the recent appointment of the teacher, which was a sore subject with the Committee of Privy Council, because they had issued supplementary rules by which they confined to a particular branch every school the scholars of which had not reached the third standard of the Revised Code. That rule might be just with regard to the old schools, but to the new schools it was most unjust, and they therefore refused to allow any allusion in the Reports to the circumstances that stamped it as unjust. These words, "considering how recently the present teachers have been in charge" were struck out by Mr. Lingen, and sent back to Mr. Morrell. That fact was directly and positively at variance with the statement made the other night in that House by the right hon. Gentleman. He repeated that all in that House gave absolute credence to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, but it raised the question how it was that the right hon. Gentleman was in ignorance of what was going on in his own Department. How was it that the permanent secretary of the Department allowed the right hon. Gentleman to make his statement in that House without bringing the facts under his notice? How was it that, whenever there was to be any inquiry, there was always that double shuffle? They never knew who was responsible—whether the Lord President, the Vice President, or the Secretary of Council; and the so-called system of Government became a mere system of scapegoats. They could not get to the bottom of the matter. The House passed a Resolution condemning the Government. The Government said, "Oh no! it is the Privy Council." The Privy Council was represented by the Lord President, but the Lord President said it was the Vice President. The Vice President resigned and proved that he was innocent, and they inquire further, and find out that it was the secretary. They cannot get at the bottom of the matter unless they had full liberty to inquire. Why was it that they were wholly unable to arrive at the real culprit, or to ascertain by whose orders and on whose responsibility these alterations were made? He wished to go into the inquiry untrammelled by the terms of reference, and therefore it was that he should record his Vote for the Amendment of his right hon. Friend.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: There is some danger of our losing sight of the real question before us. However I might be inclined to agree to the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Droitwich—and assuredly a system that in the year 1839 cost £30,000, and in 1864 has mounted up to the enormous expenditure of £705,000, is in itself an argument in favour of inquiry—yet I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman that this is either the time or place for proposing the Motion that he has brought forward. If he had proposed it in a substantive form and had given his reasons, I should have felt inclined to support him on the present occasion; but I venture to think that his Motion is at present unnecessary, and if I may take the liberty of saying so, ill-timed, and that mischief may arise from its being added as a rider to the Motion. But if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman is ill-timed, the course of the Government on this occasion is still more ill-timed and unfortunate. I think so, because, in the face of the explanations which we have heard in this House, it is ill-timed by the Government, unjust to my right hon. Friend the late Vice President, and uncalled for by this House. I was in hopes that when the Clerk at the table read the Resolution—which was carried in a moment of surprise by the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil), when he was endeavouring to close that little account before dinner on the 13th of April—it would have been read for the purpose of being rescinded; for if ever there was a Resolution which ought to have been taken up by Her Majesty's Government, it was this Resolution, carried by the noble Lord in a moment of surprise. But the course which the Government have pursued is framed on the system of justice that formerly prevailed in the Border counties, where the criminal was hanged first and tried afterwards. This is the system you are pursuing towards my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne. Can anything be more unjust or more unfair than the treatment to which he has been subjected, not only by the House but by Her Majesty's Government? At this present moment there is the fact of the censure directed against the right hon. Gentleman by the noble Lord, who takes pains to tell us that he entirely acquits him of dishonourable conduct—that he gives credence to his word, and has faith in his honour. Yet, in the teeth of those admissions, that Resolution is allowed to remain on the records of this House. He has been censured without inquiry, and sacrificed, as I think, without a cause. On the 13th of April, some four weeks ago, one or more officials under the Privy Council, who, I will take the liberty of saying, in spite of what has been stated both here and elsewhere, were equally discontented and disloyal servants of the Department, took the opportunity of dropping accusations into the lion's mouth, then represented by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, who appeared to be neither an unwilling nor an unconscious recipient of those false and calumnious charges. [Cries of "Order!"]

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I beg to move that the words of the hon. Gentleman be taken down.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I repeat—false and calumnious charges. The noble Lord has retracted those charges to-night.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I have not retracted them.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Then you ought to have retracted them. If I have understood the noble Lord, he has retracted them to-night, for he said he had every confidence in the honour of my right hon. Friend.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: The statement of the hon. Gentleman is so strong that I may be permitted to explain. My Motion was couched against the Committee of Privy Council. As regards the Committee of Privy Council, I retract not one syllable, but as regards the right hon. Gentleman, I believe the account he gives, and therefore the terms of the censure do not apply personally to him.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: O yes, it is all very well for the noble Lord to say that now; but I am sure the House will agree with me that, although his Resolution was pointed against the Committee of Privy Council, the speech was expressly directed against the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LONGFIELD: I rise to Order. The hon. Gentleman is alluding to a speech made in a former debate, which is highly irregular.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for throwing his shield over the noble Lord; but the House will remember that the attack was made personally against the Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council. What happened? Why, these precious charges by these disloyal servants—and I suppose I cannot be called to order for that—these charges, by disloyal, discontented Inspectors, were embodied in a Resolution, and were carried through this House, and the little account was closed before dinner. The Motion was carried to a division at the unpropitious hour when the propensities of the hyena were developed in the representatives of the people—when an attempt was made to suppress all debate by the hungry howls of those who wished to divide in time and close the little account before dinner. There was a majority of 101 to 93, and the right hon. Gentleman was censured, no defence being made for him, and no word having been spoken for him; he was censured, as I think, most unjustly and unfairly. What is the course taken by Her Majesty's Ministers on this occasion? They come down four weeks afterwards to say that their honour is impugned, and they move for a Committee of Inquiry. I must be permitted to say that their honour cannot be very sensitive, when it takes four weeks to look into their wounds and move for a Committee. What followed? On the 19th of April my right hon. Friend came down here, and gave such an explanation that, in the opinion even of the opponents of the right hon. Gentleman, if the First Minister of the Crown had risen in his place, and moved the rescinding of the Resolution, it would have been carried unanimously by this House. Is it not too much at this time of day to come down and ask, after more than four weeks have elapsed, for a Committee to whitewash the Office at the expense of the subordinate? I think that in the history of Parliamentary conflicts such a thing has never occurred as that when a Department is attacked the whole onus should be thrown upon the subordinate, while the President still retains his office. If there is to be an inquiry, let us have an inquiry into the whole Vote for Education. Believing that the Resolution of the noble Lord ought to be rescinded, I cannot give my support to the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), though I concur in his motive. Nor can I give my support to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey); but if an opportunity does occur, at the least I will test the sincerity and strength of will of the House by moving that the Resolution passed on the 13th of April last be rescinded by this House.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he did not understand that the debate in progress had any personal reference, and he thought that if the right hon. Gentleman who represented the Government had only seen the question in its true light, he would not have objected to the Amendment. If the previous debate was a personal one he could understand that the object of the Motion then made would be to cover the reputation of the Minister, and the Government might legitimately oppose any such addition to the reference as would divert the inquiry from that object. As far, however, as the debate was meant to cast no reflection upon the Minister, but referred to the general constitution and conduct of the Office, he would ask the right hon. Baronet whether he would not agree to the Amendment and allow the inquiry to take place into the constitution and general conduct of the Office as connected with the practices which had been complained of. If the late Vice President of the Council was wrongly accused, he had been amply justified by what had passed since. The only thing which surprised him, and which he regretted, was that his resignation was the consequence of the vote come to by the House; but the fact of that resignation was an argument for making the inquiry general into the constitution of the Office. He had taken no part in the debate because he considered it to be a discussion on the practice of the Office in the matter of these Reports, a point on which he had never finished from expressing his opinion plainly; and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) to say whether, when the question was raised in the previous year, he did not frankly defend a practice which he had begun in the Office, and which he was always ready to maintain was necessary there. When he went to the Privy Council Office he found that the Inspectors had in more than one instance got into the habit of exceeding their proper and legitimate functions. For example, he found that once a year they met in a sort of Parliament in the Office to discuss not only abstract questions relating to education, but the conduct of the Office specifically; and they adopted Resolutions upon a division which might or might not be consistent with the administration of the Department in pursuance of the Votes of the House. In his opinion the Inspectors not only exceeded their functions in doing so, but they established a dangerous practice. He therefore took upon himself to put a stop to it, stating that though very likely it might be for the public interest that the Inspectors should meet to discuss educational questions, he must demur to their adoption of Resolutions which, as he had said, might be inconsistent with the administration of the Department, by responsible Ministers, in pursuance of the votes of the House. Again, in some of their Reports he found that the Inspectors went far beyond all reasonable and proper limits, entering into philosophical disquisitions upon educational theories, writing essays rather than Reports, and thereby destroying much of their value as Reports. He was the first to restrain that practice. From time to time he sent back the Reports in draught to the Inspectors, pointing out the passages he objected to, and requesting them to alter their Reports accordingly. It was after a debate in this House upon the subject that he had laid down the rule that the Reports should be made under five different heads; and he took upon himself to say that any Report which travelled beyond these heads—four of which related to schools, teachers, discipline, and so on, the fifth consisting of general practical suggestions—could not be considered in the nature of a Report or be printed by the House as an official Report on schools. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had modified that practice, and began the system which he had described as making the Inspectors their own censors. For himself, he confessed his fear that the result of the late division would be that no subsequent Vice President would venture to curtail these Reports in any respect, but would be obliged to give an unlimited licence to the Inspectors to write pamphlets, sermons, disquisitions, and reviews, at the public expense. He did not in the slightest degree question the right of the House, if they chose, to order the printing of thirty or forty educational treatises every year. From time to time the House ordered certain sermons which were preached before it to be printed; but he would never omit an opportunity of expressing his opinion against the practice in the case before the House of allowing sermons to be printed as Reports, and would always maintain that every Department should exercise some control over the Reports issued by it and were bound to prevent any such abuse. He did not take part in the late debate, because it did not seem to him that the debate turned upon that point. It rather seemed to involve a specific charge that in certain Reports passages were omitted which the Department wished to be omitted, while other passages which accorded with their policy were retained. That was a charge as to the grounds of which he had no knowledge whatever, and he therefore took no part in the debate. With regard to the Amendment before the House, he regarded it as most essential. Even if the question were a personal question a preliminary Report might be made on that special point before the Committee dealt with the general question, and the objection on the ground of delay in deciding on a personal charge would be thus met. He was strongly convinced of the necessity of a general investigation into the constitution and conduct of the Department; for he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that an Executive office with two Ministers, a President who had other business, and a Vice President who did the work, but whose responsibility was limited by the existence of a President—this was a constitution unparalleled in any other Department in the State. The system of Minutes of Council was highly unconstitutional, and, if necessary in this particular instance, highly dangerous unless under the strictest control. By these Minutes the Crown was able to tax the country without due control of Parliament, and possibly even without the cognizance of Parliament. The constitutional theory was that the Crown asked for money, that the House of Commons granted it, and that the Lords assented to the grant. But by those Minutes, the country might be taxed before it had any public requisition, notice, or discussion, and the House might be involved in engagements from which it could not honourably extricate itself, and which added largely to the public expenditure, without the knowledge, and in many cases against the will of the House. The sooner such a system was brought under revision the better. In no other Department was there such discretion vested as that which gave the Committee of Council in possible cases unlimited powers of increasing and appropriating the public expenditure. It was true that at present any Minute of the Committee must lie upon the table for one month before it could have the force of a law; but that was an insufficient provision. He was for having a better notice given to the House of any new Minute, and an entire stoppage of the practice of altering Minutes by mere circular letters; but he could not agree with his right hon. Friend that Minutes of Council should only come into operation at one period of the year. Such a restriction would interfere with the ordinary admininistration of the Office. He would conclude by asking the Home Secretary whether, after what had passed, he still thought it necessary to oppose the Amendment?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I still think the subjects of inquiry proposed by the Motion and the Amendment respectively ought to be kept wholly separate and distinct. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich said he was quite ready to agree that the Committee should in the first instance, and before entering on the general inquiry, report on the specific charges, the subject of the inquiry which the Government propose; but the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) repudiates any such proceeding, and says the specific is mixed up with the general inquiry, and it would be impossible to come to a conclusion on the former without going into the latter. On that point I entirely differ from the noble Lord. I think that the specific is quite distinct from the general inquiry, and that the two ought not to be mixed up together. They ought to be kept altogether distinct, and to be referred—if they are to be made the subjects of inquiry—to distinct Committees. My hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Osborne) seems to think that we are acting unfairly towards my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne. Nothing would grieve me more than to think so. My right hon. Friend thought that the Resolution of the 12th April made personal allusion to him; he has since perfectly exonerated himself from every personal charge; and certainly I was under the impression that in taking the course we have taken we were acting with the consent and approval of my right hon. Friend.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 142: Majority 49.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered,

That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with respect to the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools.

And, on Tuesday, June 7, Committee nominated as follows:—

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair.”

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he was in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would, on the Motion for going into Committee on the Civil Service Estimates, have condescended to make some statement to the House with reference to the large amount of those Estimates, explaining why some of them had increased and why others had not been greatly diminished. Those Estimates amounted to near £8,000,000. Complaints had constantly been made that they were brought before the House without being fully considered by the Government. He had placed upon the paper a notice for a Committee of Inquiry into the whole subject, but it was not until Tuesday that this Motion obtained such a position as gave it a chance of coming on, and then for some reason or other the House was counted out. It pleased the hon. Knight who represents Coventry to work out the purpose of the Government in getting rid of his Motion on that occasion. Now, considering the hon. Member represented a constituency in which there was a greater number of the working classes included than in any other in the kingdom, he was the more surprised at such a course, and it was a proof that the fear of such bodies of electors were not likely, more than others, in influencing their representatives to do their duty as a check on extravagant expenditure. He wished to draw attention to the great increase that had taken place in those Estimates during the ten years from 1854 to 1864. During that time they had increased nearly £3,000,000, or more exactly £2,702,000. No doubt it was said that that increase was more apparent than real, because a variety of charges had been transferred to them which were formerly paid direct from the Consolidated Fund, but, taking both payments made from the Consolidated Fund and through Estimates, the actual increase was as he had stated. Taking first the payments which were made direct from the Consolidated Fund, the accounts stood thus:—

The total under the six heads was £2,500,000 in 1854, and £1,965,000, in 1864, so that there was a diminution, not of the £1,100,100 transferred to the annual Votes, but of little more than £500,000. The total amount of the Estimates for 1854 was £4,471,500, while this year it was £7,702,000, and adding these figures to the Consolidated Fund charges, they had a total Civil Service expenditure of £6,972,088 in 1854, against £9,674,808, or an increase of £2,702,720 this year. The manner in which the Civil Service accounts were kept was most unsatisfactory. There was no regular debtor and creditor account which would show the expenditure in any one Department. And yet we maintained a most expensive staff to look after our expenditure. He was sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not in his place, but probably the public expenditure was nothing to him, though he was always scolding the House for its extravagance. The right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion had admitted clearly and distinctly that the Treasury had no proper control over the different Departments of the Government, and it was that want of control which lay at the root of our large expenditure. Though the admission was important, the grievance was an old one. So long ago as 1810, a Committee upon Public Accounts was nominated, in whose report the evil was pointed out, notwithstanding it had never been thoroughly corrected yet. Now let the House consider the cost of the Executive, established for the purpose of looking after the public expenditure. At the Treasury we had, besides the First Lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, two Secretaries, and three Junior Lords to look after the expenditure, whose salaries amounted to £17,000 a year. As to the Junior Lords, if they were altogether discontinued it would be a great saving to the country. They were generally selected one from each of the three kingdoms; and their chief function was to get what they could for their respective countries, and to assist in any jobs which might be going on. With their clerks and assistants the whole expense of the Treasury machinery was £60,000 a year. Then there was the Controller of the Exchequer, at £2,000, with his clerks, amounting altogether to £10,000; the Paymaster's Office, £25,000; the Audit Office, £40,000; making, in all, £135,000 for machinery for looking after our expenditure. Not only did the representatives of Departments neglect to exercise control over the public expenditure, but they neutralized the efforts of independent Members to obtain even an inquiry into the manner in which the public money was expended. Another subject of complaint which he urged was the haphazard character of the accounts and the incongruous items of which they were composed. The Board of Works sometimes determined on carrying out important works without any authority from the Treasury or from Parliament. The proposed School for Naval Architects would cost a large sum, and it had been settled that it should be situated at Kensington. He should like to know whether the Treasury had examined that plan and approved it. Another head of increased expenditure was salaries and pensions. It appeared from a Return moved for by Mr. Hume in 1849 that there were 8,000 persons receiving out of the public purse in the shape of salaries or pensions, ranging down to £50, and in 1862 a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Brighton showed that the number of persons in receipt of pensions had risen to 10,000, though the limit of such was confined to those who received sums exceeding £150 out of the public purse, so that from 1849 to 1862 the number of persons receiving salaries and pensions had increased by no less a number than 2,000. Another cause of their lavish expenditure was that they were apt to multiply offices and institutions designed for the same purpose. They had at the British Museum, at Jermyn Street, and at Kensington, collections of nearly the same nature, which often carried on a rivalry in the purchase of specimens, and actually bade against each other. The control of the Treasury ought to check that source of extravagance. Then they had other picture collections at Kensington, the National Gallery, and the Portrait Gallery, each of which entailed its separate expenditure for maintenance and establishment. Again, at Greenwich they had an establishment of high scientific importance, which was very economically conducted; but then, again, they had a sort of duplicate to that in the Weather Department attached to the Board of Trade, which cost a very large sum. Anything more absurd than the system by which they attempted from day to day to prophesy the weather it was hardly possible to conceive. Fortune-telling was punished by law, but here they had a department of the Board of Trade which professed to foretell what the weather would be two days hence. He had tested a number of these weather prophecies by the result, and found that they were about once right and twice wrong. There was an institution at Paris of a much higher scientific order than that under the Board of Trade. He did not see why such meteorological observations as were necessary or valuable to us should not be taken at Greenwich, instead of our having two establishments or rather three, as there was another on a small scale at Kew, connected with the same subjects. The Board of Trade was a Department which had greatly expanded, and in reference to railways, it affected the powers of Pluto, and that of Neptune as respects the mercantile marine; but he did not think it should undertake the functions of Æolus. The principal departments in which the increased expenditure to which he referred had taken place were the Office of Works, the Office of Woods, the Office of Education and of Science and Art, the Irish Education Office, the Board of Trade, and then Law and Justice. That, however, to which he particularly wished to call the attention of the House was the expenditure in connection with superannuations. The sums paid under that head were astounding. The total amount of the pensions connected with the Civil Service was, he found, £1,262,000, while those for the non-effective portions of the army and navy, including what used to be called the dead weight, amounted to £4,200,000; so that we actually paid over £5,400,000 in the shape of superannuation allowances for past services, being one-thirteenth part of our total expenditure, including the debt, and actually one-eighth excluding the debt. The Board of Trade affords us a notable instance this year of the carelessness with which superannuations are granted by the Treasury in the cases of Lord Hobart and Mr. Edgar Bowring, the first of whom is but forty-two years of age and the second but thirty-eight. The plea is abolition of office, which is a mere fiction in regard to both, as the actual official staff of the Board of Trade has been very largely extended. But there are an infinite number of ingenious devices by which these jobs are perpetrated under the several terms of abolition of office—reduction—revision—regulation—re-arrangement—and re-organization: As regards Mr. Edgar Bowring, who held two offices there as Registrar and Librarian, and is pensioned off at the salary which he received for both, that of Librarian has been filled up at a salary, which, with that gentleman's pension, actually saddles the public with a heavier charge than was before incurred. If these parties are entitled to superannuations, there is not a clerk in any similar office of the same age who is not entitled to be as favourably dealt with. Then there were the Departments of Works and of Woods and Forests, the expenditure for which had greatly increased since their separation, as would be seen from the fact that while that expenditure for the ten years up to 1852 was only £364,627, it reached in the next ten years £686,456, or a total increase on ten years of £321,829, or £32,000 per annum. The receipts from Forests during the previous year amounted to £49,000, while the expenses were £32,000, so that the clear income derived by the country from what are called the Royal Forests did not amount to more than £17,000. It would be far better to sell them and apply the proceeds to the purchase of lands which the country wanted for a variety of other purposes. He also objected to the payment of large sums for pieces of ground which from time immemorial had been in the possession of the public. The site of the new Foreign Office was called Crown property, and many thousands had been paid for it to the Office of Works out of the monies voted by Parliament for purchasing the site necessary for those buildings, though, in the calculations given on which those votes were asked for, ground already belonging to the Crown was not included, or had Parliament the slightest notion that they were voting money to pay for what already belonged to the country. They pulled down the State Paper Office for some reason or other, which a few years ago cost £40,000 to erect, and then they paid £7,000 for the site which had been used as Crown property for a very long time. Nothing was more likely than that the site of the present National Gallery would be claimed by the Office of Woods and Forests as Crown property, and that a large sum would be required to purchase it on the removal of the collection to Burlington Gardens. Enormous sums had already been expended in this way, and he trusted a stop would be put to so needless a waste of public money. It likewise occurred to him that a considerable saving might be effected in connection with the system of what may be called the clerkdom in public offices, and the mode of their selection by competitive examinations. That system, though useful in some respects, tended, as at present conducted, to great expenditure and also to extreme dissatisfaction. It encouraged persons of superior attainments to seek employment in the public service, and those persons, being above their work, were naturally dissatisfied with the existing scale of salaries, and adopted every means to raise it. What the country wanted, particularly in the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, were mere clerks, able to read, write, and calculate, and not fine scholars. Recently all the employés in the Post Office wanted an increase of their salaries, though sufficiently well paid already, and he believed the same thing was going on in the Customs. He agreed with the views expressed by the late Sir Henry Parnell in his work On Financial Reform, that high salaries not only imposed a great burden upon the public, but also made clerks less efficient, and that there could not be a greater mistake than to suppose that fitness would follow in proportion as the amount of salary was higher. Sir Henry's words are remarkable, and he was sure the House would pardon him for quoting them. He writes, p. 206—

"The clerks in the commissariat are real clerks, not the sons of persons of the higher ranks, but of a humbler description. They are perfectly satisfied with what they receive, and do their work remarkably well. . . . Those persons who are willing to work for a small remuneration have the greatest relish for work; and, therefore, giving low salaries will secure the filling of the low offices with the most efficient clerks."

In their last Report, the Commissioners said that no person had been rejected except for want of efficiency in writing, spelling, and arithmetic; but the fact was that in the competitive examinations success depended in great measure upon the possession of qualifications which were quite unnecessary for the work intrusted to public clerks, as anybody will discover who examines the candidate tables given in the Report, where those who are first in the above acquirements often do not succeed, inferior penmen excluding them by marks for geography, history, or other branches of a liberal education. The time had come for Parliament to look into the subject. It was one of the first duties of Parliament to check expenditure, and he was persuaded that if that duty were longer neglected the cry for Parliamentary reform would get louder and louder every year. They had frequently been told that the voting of supplies was a mere matter of course, and that the Estimates must be taken upon the responsibility of Ministers. How was that official responsibility to be tested? What official victim could be sacrificed upon the altar of economy? By what means was the House to bring the guilt home to the real offender? If the Treasury would only apply themselves earnestly to the study of economy, and Parliament would back them, he was satisfied they might reduce the Civil Service Estimates by at least a million, that is one penny income tax, without impairing in the least degree the efficiency of the public service.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that the hon. Gentleman had alluded to him personally, as he happened to be the unfortunate wight who had interposed between him and the House on the previous Tuesday. The hon. Member had intended to deliver then the speech he had addressed to the House that night, but as on Tuesday there were only thirteen Members present, and he thought the hon. Gentleman's observations could be made with more effect and propriety on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, he had called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the state of the House. That evening the hon. Gentleman had spoken for an hour and a half, but he had not been able to secure a much larger audience, for during the greater part of his speech not more than twenty Members were in the House. As, however, the Estimates were before the House, he did not venture what he would have otherwise been inclined to do—to try a count. He would not anticipate the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury, but the field over which the hon. Gentleman had travelled was so large, and his opinions so decided, that one could not help suspecting he deemed himself quite capable of carrying on the whole Government of the country, with the aid of two or three clerks.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that at present only a few branches of the Civil Service expenditure were subject to the appropriation audit; but it was very desirable that the same check should be extended to the whole Estimates. He wished to know whether the Treasury had taken any steps with that object? The measure had been strongly urged by the Public Monies Committee. He did not quite agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Truro, as to the existing machinery being imperfect. In his opinion, however, the Audit Board and some other Departments had a tendency to fail for want of a clear and definite system of action; and the House would do well to give them more power and support. Even as it was, the Audit Board did good service. He believed, also, that the Office of Woods and Forests might be rendered more useful if it had fair play. That Department, and also the Ordnance, ought to be properly represented in the House. Hon. Members ought to try to improve the machinery now in operation, and not to discredit it. He would refrain from touching on the various questions raised by his hon. Friend, as they would be more properly discussed in Committee.

COLONEL SYKES said, the hon. Member for Truro deserved credit for the great trouble he had taken in examining an important subject, and in calling attention to the continual progressive increase of expenditure year after year. That was a most melancholy fact and deserved consideration. As long as the Estimates remained at their present excessive figure, the country must be content to bear the heavy burdens now imposed. The first step to a reduction of taxation was, of course, a reduction of expenditure.

MR. PEEL said, that the House would fall into a serious error if it was led to suppose that the Civil Service expenditure was not audited. On the contrary, the bulk of the Civil Service Estimates were audited with great minuteness. Only a few of the Votes, however, were subjected to the appropriation audit for the purpose of making a comparison between the actual expenditure of the year and the grants of money. He admitted that it was desirable that that audit should be extended so as to embrace all the services comprised in the Estimates, more especially as the Appropriation Act now limited the grants made to the payments falling due within the year. The matter was under the consideration of the Government, with a view to seeing what could be done. The House, he was sure, would hardly desire him to follow the hon. Member for Truro through all the details of his speech. Indeed, he doubted whether he had it in his power to do so, as he had no idea that the hon. Gentleman was going to make so lengthened a statement, and to take so comprehensive and minute a survey, charging the Treasury with abusing and mismanaging every trust confided to them. As to the Lords of the Treasury availing themselves of appointments as a means of obtaining undue advantages for their constituencies, he could hardly suppose that the hon. Gentleman made that charge seriously. It was certainly altogether an unfounded suggestion. Then, again, instead of the Treasury comprising sinecure appointments, there was really no branch of the public service to which that remark less applied; and he believed the officers were generally fully employed. There was not a single instance in which the Secretary to the Treasury had prefaced the introduction of the Civil Service Estimates by a long speech. The fact was that these Estimates were quite different from those for the army and navy, which each referred to a single service. The Miscellaneous Estimates included such a variety of services, from national education to public works, which had no relation to each other, that they could not be explained in a single speech. At the same time, he would take that opportunity of calling attention to the generally satisfactory state of the Civil Service Estimates. They showed a reduction upon almost every branch. Although on particular items there had been some increase as compared with last year, more particularly with respect to the Votes for law and justice and prisons. But notwithstanding that the Civil Service Estimates, on the whole, showed a reduction of £180,000 as compared with last year, which also showed a considerable reduction as compared with the previous year, there was a reduction in the revenue Vote, although the number of persons employed and the salaries paid had a tendency to increase. With respect to the Packet Service Estimate there was a reduction of £80,000. After making due allowance for the increase in the Votes for public education, and the additions which had been made to the Civil Service Estimates by transferring to them services which used formerly to be paid by other funds, it would be found that the increase in the Estimates was not three millions, as stated by the hon. Member for Truro, but merely some hundreds of thousands, which it would not be difficult to account for under all the circumstances of the case. With regard to the charges on the Consolidated Fund and the payments out of income of Woods and Forests, on which the hon. Member had asked for information, he would observe that an increase had taken place in two branches of the Consolidated Fund charges. There was an increase of about £40,000 in the miscellaneous advances, and that was to be accounted for in the following manner:—By the Act abolishing passing tolls the principal and interest of the debts due in respect to Whitby Harbour were charged on the Consolidated Fund. The interest on the debt was 4 per cent, and a saving of £300 a year was effected by paying off the principal. The amount paid for the extinguishment of that debt was the cause of the increase in the miscellaneous payments out of the Consolidated Fund. Under the Customs Consolidated Act of 1854 the whole of the customs revenue of the Isle of Man, amounting to £27,000, was annually paid into the Exchequer. The Treasury was bound to pay the ordinary civil expenses of the island, and to give one-ninth of the customs revenue of the island for the construction of new harbours, and for purposes connected with public works. The public works were not undertaken until last year, and for the purpose of carrying them on, the whole of the accumulated charge on account of the one-ninth of the customs revenue of the island, amounting to £27,000 in all, was required. The sum was paid, and that explained how that particular increase had taken place. The payments out of the income of the Department of Woods and Forests were strictly in accordance with the Act of Parliament, which was based upon a sort of compact by which the Crown, in return for a Civil List, surrendered its land revenues during the lifetime of the Sovereign; and he did not think that, consistently with the observance of that compact, any fundamental change could be introduced into the mode in which those revenues were administered. The payments might appear to be large, but they went towards the improvement of the estates, and in most instances interest was charged upon the tenants of the properties where the improvements took place, and the consequence was that the income from the land revenues was continually increasing. The other questions which had been raised by the hon. Member for Truro referred to the details of the Votes, and he should therefore reserve any explanations which might be needed until the House had gone into Committee of Supply.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it would be a great convenience as well as a source of important information to the House if a Return were presented to the House, showing the amount of the Votes which remained unexpended at the end of every year.

MR. SCULLY said, he thought that the hon. Member for Truro had hardly been fairly treated. He had done good service by calling the attention of the House to these details, and if it had not been for him the House would have been dispersed. At one time there were only twenty Members in the House, there were six in the lobbies, six in the tea-room, six in the library, and thirty-nine in the dining-room. He did not blame those hon. Members for being out of the House, because they knew that if they had been present they could have done no good, that all the nibbling and cheeseparing in the world would never reduce the Estimates below the amount at which the Government chose to fix them. The late hon. Member for Montrose and the hon. Member for Lambeth, who at one time was called a "continuation of Hume," had gone through the same process that the hon. Member for Truro was now being subjected to, and the experience of that hon. Member had led him to confine his speech that evening to a period of only about two minutes. The people of Ireland were more interested in the matter than were those of England, because of all the taxation which was taken from Ireland none flowed back to that country, except the small amounts expended for English purposes, such as the payment of an English Lord Lieutenant, who could be made of no use here, and a Chief Secretary, who was the most mischievous man in the country. The only Irish purpose for which money was expended was the payment of the Judges. The stream of taxation was poured out to enrich England alone, and that was the reason why English Members were so indifferent to the enormous taxation imposed on other parts of the kingdom.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in reply to the hon. Member for Lambeth, he had to state that it would not be possible for him to undertake to present on an early day in each Session an account of the state of the unexpended balances in the Civil Service Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

SUPPLY considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £40,258, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Maintenance and Repair of the Royal Palaces."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had no desire to make any observations in reference to palaces occupied by the Royal family; but he believed that no member of the Royal family resided in Kensington Palace, and that the only person there was a very old lady, and he, therefore, wished to know how the £1,237 set down for it was expended. For Bushey Park House the sum of £1,319 was asked, and he wished to ask who it was who occupied that building. There was also an item for repairing and cleansing the fittings in the Chapel Royal, St. James's, but he believed that Her Majesty never attended that chapel.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed, that there had been a general and silent increase in these Estimates from year to year. He wished to have some explanation of an apparent excess of £12,696 spent beyond the sum voted for 1862-3.

MR. COWPER said, that the expenditure on Kensington Palace and Bushey House was solely for the purpose of keeping them in ordinary repair and preventing them going to decay. The Chapel Royal, St. James's, was attended every Sunday by a considerable congregation, and it was necessary to maintain the building in a proper state of repair. Though Her Majesty had a chapel at Buckingham Palace, still many members of the Royal family attended the Chapel

Royal, St. James's. In reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Evesham, he had to observe that the excess referred to was paid out of the balances of previous years. The old system was to pay money for the purpose for which it was originally voted, without reference to the year in which the payment was made; but a different plan was now adopted, and at the end of the year the balance was paid over to the Exchequer.

MR. PEACOCKE said, it appeared that a private road, by which the public had been admitted to Richmond Park through Roehampton Gate, had recently been purchased by a gentleman named Prescott, and closed by him against the public, so that Roehampton Gate was only of use to that gentleman, his family, and friends. He did not see that the public should be put to the expense of keeping up the gate solely for the use of that gentleman, who would not give the public in return the use of the road, and he moved that the Vote be reduced by £50, which would be about the expenditure connected with the gate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. COWPER said, the case was rather peculiar. The gate was, of course, open to the public, as all the other gates of Richmond Park were, but the road that led to the gate was private property. That property had lately come into the possession of Mr. Prescott, and he allowed all the residents in Richmond Park to pass along the road, but not the general public. If Mr. Prescott were more liberally disposed he might have opened it to the public, but it ought to be remembered that the expense of repairing the road fell upon the owner, and if he were to allow the public to use it the increased expense of the repairs would be thrown upon himself. He had suggested to Mr. Prescott that he might, without incurring additional expense, allow all persons on horseback to make use of the road, but he did not know whether that suggestion would be adopted. If the extreme rights of the Crown were enforced the gate might be shut up altogether, which might not be a very agreeable thing to Mr. Prescott and other persons living on the road. However, the annual expense of repairing the gate was only about £5, and if any reduction was to be moved it ought to be £5, and not £50. He hoped, under the circumstances, his hon. Friend would content himself with having expressed a wish upon the matter, and would not divide the Committee.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he would not press his Motion provided the right hon. Gentleman would see the suggestion carried out—that all persons on horseback and in private carriages should be allowed to pass through the gate in return for the use of it by Mr. Prescott.

MR. COWPER said, he had no power to coerce Mr. Prescott.

MR. PEACOCKE said, the right hon. Gentleman might shut up the gate. If he would engage to shut up the gate, unless Mr. Prescott opened the road, he would not divide the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped his right hon. Friend would not be asked to enter into a specific engagement. Mr. Prescott was, no doubt, a gentleman of intelligence and sagacity, and would understand what the feeling of Parliament was upon the subject. The existing state of things was certainly one which ought not to continue.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.) £77,531, to complete the sum for Public Buildings.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call attention to a sum of £9,933 for repairs of ecclesiastical and collegiate buildings, &c., in Scotland. There were sums set down for maintenance and repairs of the old Scotch cathedrals, which were no longer of any use.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he thought the hon. Gentleman had extended his economical views beyond their legitimate bounds. No one had seen the Scotch cathedrals without feeling that they contained some of the most beautiful specimens of architecture, not only that the three kingdoms, but that the world possessed, while the sums asked for their preservation were but small. He was sure the Committee would not agree with the paring-down spirit of the hon. Gentleman. He was happy to see that something was going to be done at last about that very valuable possession of the Crown—Burlington House. Some twelve years ago when he first had the honour of a seat in that House, there was talk of doing something, but nothing had been done. When the immense value of a spot of ground in that part of London was taken into consideration, some explanation of the delay was due. How was it that successive Governments, during a period of so many years, had made no use of the spot. As he understood the plan that was in contemplation, a building was to be erected at the rear in order to receive the national pictures. But to place our National Gallery—a building which, no doubt, would be of some architectural merit—in the background, required explanation. It appeared there was to be an approach to the Gallery, through the centre of Burlington House; but he could not make out how that was to be managed. He could not help thinking that something ought to be done to give the public an opportunity of seeing Burlington House. For one hundred years that building had been admired by architectural critics, and yet it was kept from the view of the public. He supposed at some time it was intended to carry a street from Piccadilly to the north, through Cork Street, or thereabouts, for the purpose of relieving Bond Street and Regent Street; but if those buildings were erected there, all hopes of that kind would be put an end to.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the people of Scotland took a different course with respect to their cathedrals from the people of England. Here the people defaced the cathedrals, but kept them in their own hands; but in Scotland they respected them, but handed them over to the Crown. And now a sum of £9,000 was asked for those beautiful buildings, simply because they were Crown property. With respect to a different question, when the time came for deciding whether a new National Gallery which would cost £150,000, ought to be placed on the ground behind Burlington House, he hoped that matter would be discussed by a more numerous Committee. He hoped at that time, also, they would have a satisfactory solution of that really difficult question. His hon. Friend could not understand how it was that two successive Governments had failed to settle the question about Burlington House; but that there had been two successive Governments explained that unfortunate fact. Had there been only one Government, the matter would have been decided long ago.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS complained that while £11,000 was asked for rates and taxes for public buildings in Westminster and London, the Government refused to pay not only poor rates, but rates for drainage and sewerage for their large establishments at Deptford. In some places Government paid those rates, in others they rejected all claims for them. The practice showed such a want of principle as to require some explanation.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he took objection to the item for rents paid for public offices erected upon land belonging to the public. He might instance the Geological Museum in Jermyn Street, as an example, where a large amount of money had been expended in building upon land belonging to the public.

MR. COWPER said, that the complaint of the hon. Member for Truro really was, that a better system of accounts was now adopted than had been in use in former times. Now that the department of Public Works was separated from the Woods and Forests, it was right that rent should be paid for Crown land, whether let for public or private purposes. With respect to the item for repairs of ecclesiastical buildings in Scotland, they were about twenty-four in number, and among them were the palaces of Holyrood and Linlithgow, the Register Office in Edinburgh, and some ruined cathedrals upon which a small expenditure was necessary to prevent them from absolutely disappearing. He would not follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir William Fraser) into a discussion of a Vote that would come on for consideration at a future time, but when that time did arrive, he would be prepared to give the fullest explanation, and hoped to persuade the House that the course proposed by the Government was a wise one to pursue. With respect to the point raised by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons) it was quite true that a different practice had been adopted with regard to public buildings in the metropolis to that which prevailed in respect of public buildings outside the metropolis. The distinction, however, had been made for many years, and had invariably been observed. The subject adverted to by the hon. Member for Greenwich was under the consideration of the Government and would receive their earnest attention.

COLONEL W. STUART asked for an explanation of an item of £42 on account of the formation of a road near Holyhead.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the explanation of the First Commissioner of Works only led to the question of why rent was not paid for the Treasury or for the parks.

MR. COWPER said, he must admit that perhaps rent ought to be paid for the Treasury, but the parks were in a different category, as they were placed by Act of Parliament under the management of the Office of Works. The small item for the road at Holyhead was a mere re-Vote of a sum formerly voted, which had lapsed on account of not having been claimed.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Supply and Repair of Furniture in the various Public Departments."

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he could not understand why a large sum was asked for the furniture of the Kensington Museum. He moved that the Vote be reduced by £3,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £9,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Supply and Repair of Furniture in the various Public Departments."
—(Mr. Augustus Smith.)

MR. COWPER said, the furniture was no more than was required for the School of Art and the buildings attached to it. He admitted that in the first instance the item might have been placed in a different class in the Science and Art Department. It had, however, appeared in these Estimates in former years, and it was not desirable to shift it now, as that would alter the headings and prevent an accurate comparison between one year and another.

MR. GREGORY complained of the manner in which the Estimates were compiled with reference to the Votes for furniture. It was the practice with regard to the Irish Industrial Museum, because it was out of favour with the Government and very popular with the people of Ireland, to make the expenses for fittings, furniture, &c., as large as possible, thereby creating a false impression with regard to the cost of that establishment. It was very strange that the cost of these articles for the British Museum should be included in its own Estimate, and the South Kensington excluded from its own Estimate.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was never satisfied with the mode of arriving at the Estimates of fittings, furniture, &c., required by the various Departments. The officer who was really responsible for the Vote was the Vice President of the Committee on Education, and not the Chief Commissioner of Works; and he regretted that the former right hon. Gentleman was not present to explain it. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works exercised a supervision over the general Votes for furniture; but with regard to the fittings at South Kensington he was in the hands of the officers of the Department, and was as powerless as a child. On the first blush of it the cost appeared to be great, as it amounted to about one-third of the whole sum required, but he had no doubt it was susceptible of explanation. The item, however, ought to be transferred to the Vote for Education.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he thought it better to make the alteration at once than to wait for another year, when the matter might be forgotten.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked, whether the Vote for furniture at South Kensington was to be regarded as an annually recurring charge, or one of an exceptional nature consequent on the extensive alterations which had been recently sanctioned by Parliament?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he had only named £3,000 in his Amendment as a round sum. He found by reference to the Estimates that the exact amount asked for fittings and furniture for the Department of Science and Art was £4,300, and he accordingly begged to substitute that amount in his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. COWPER said, that about one-half of the expenditure was for special purposes, which it was hoped would not occur again. It was required for the completion of very extensive galleries and rooms which had only recently been finished, and which would require special furnishing and fittings. The ordinary repairs in future years would probably not be more than £2,300 instead of £4,300. He agreed with the noble Lord that this was a duty he would rather not have placed on his Department, but that it should be transferred to the responsible person. The control had, however, remained with the Office of Works because it was considered more economical for his office, which was continually making contracts for these things, to supply all articles of this kind that were required for South Kensington. On the score of economy, it was better to leave the supplying of these articles to his Department.

MR. SCULLY said, there was a positive increase of £3,800 on the Vote for the present year, and asked for an explanation.

MR. COWPER said, that if the hon. Member would compare the sum proposed that year of £17,300 with £19,611 last year, he would find there was a decrease on the total, and if he compared the particular item under discussion with that of last year he would find a saving of £311.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he must press the right hon. Gentleman to accede to the classification of expenditure which had been suggested.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would express a hope that the hon. Member for Truro would not divide the Committee upon the Vote. The principle of his Motion would go much further than the Motion itself. No doubt it was desirable, and it would be very convenient, that the figures should be so arranged as that they might see at a glance the expense of each public Department with regard to furniture, fittings, &c.; but to do that they must depart from the principle which they had very largely adopted, and which they regarded as a general rule in the arrangement of the Estimates, namely:—That every article required by a Department should be furnished in the most economical manner possible. They could not recognize the two principles together. To get the articles at the cheapest rate it was desirable that they should be furnished by the Board of Works, because they had dealings with the tradesmen who had to supply them, and were accustomed to make the necessary contracts. It would be far less economical than at present were the different Departments to send out a messenger or housekeeper all round London for the purpose of ordering each for itself what was required. Although his right hon. Friend had not so much control over this Vote as he would over the supply of chairs, tables, and carpets, with which he was so familiar, for the other Departments, yet he was essentially a manufacturer, and could obtain what was required at a much less cost than the Vice President of the Council on Education.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH admitted the soundness of the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it was not carried out in all the Departments.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought it was not worth while to divide on the Vote. He thought the Vote was in its proper place.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question,

"That the Item of £4,300, for Fittings and Articles of Furniture for the Department of Science and Art, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Augustus Smith),

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £72,944, to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Grounds.

MR. COX said, that the Vote contained items of £6,846 for Battersea Park, £1,584 for Kennington Park, £9,964 for Regent's Park, and £5,934 for Victoria Park. A petition had been lately presented complaining that a certain portion of Battersea Park had been handed over to the Civil Service Cricket Club for their exclusive use. He was informed that the club consisted of 230 members, and that 19,000 square yards of ground had been set apart for them. Another portion of ground of about 18,000 square yards was allotted to 14 other clubs, consisting of 600 or 700 members. A third portion, which was of no use whatever, was given to the general public for cricket. He wished to ask whether similar arrangements had been made for playing at cricket in Regent's Park and Victoria Park, and whether the First Commissioner of Works had selected any portion of those parks for the exclusive use of any other servants of the Crown. He had another question to ask in regard to Kennington Park. It was an inclosure not much larger than Lincoln's Inn Fields, comprising about 15 or 16 acres of ground. Every year between £1,500 and £1,600 was laid out, not for the benefit and enjoyment of the public, but to furnish grazing for sheep. He himself lately saw the poor children of the locality, who used freely to play on the grass when the place was called Kennington Common, excluded from the grass of the park and compelled to play on the gravel, while the sheep were enjoying the turf. He thought it too much to maintain a spot of ground at a cost of £100 per acre for the exclusive benefit of a few sheep.

MR. CARNEGIE said, that the Civil Service Cricket Club had expended a great deal of money on their cricket ground in Battersea Park, and had made it worth something, whereas the space occupied by the general public being constantly knocked about was in very bad condition. He could not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the space allotted to the public was worth nothing, but if the general public were admitted to play on the Civil Service ground that would soon be worth very little as a cricket ground.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he wished to know whether the ground rents of Regent's Park were reckoned in the item relating to that Park, or carried to the public account?

SIR EDWARD DERING said, the public in general owed great obligations to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner for the improvements which he had made in the parks. There was, however, a class of persons whose good opinion no doubt he would wish to conciliate, and whose requirements had been overlooked, and who had a paramount claim upon his attention—he meant the ladies who rode in Rotten Row, and who had at present not the slightest shelter or protection from the inclemency of the weather. After a smart shower the ride had to be given up, or the unfortunate individuals were obliged to ride in their wet clothes, which no doubt caused much discomfort and inconvenience. The question was whether it would not be very easy to adopt a remedy for all this inconvenience. If the right hon. Gentleman would only adopt the precedent in the Bois de Boulogne, in various parts of which were scattered about shelter sheds, simple in construction and inexpensive, he would afford shelter both for riders and pedestrians, and at the same time not encroach on the rights of the people. There was, he believed, a central and convenient spot where these shelter sheds might be placed. The House should remember, too, that the ladies were never insensible to benefits conferred upon them.

MR. SCULLY said, he wished to know, from either the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, or the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lambeth, whether Battersea Park had made the Return for the expenditure devoted to it which was so confidently anticipated some years ago. He regarded the case of Battersea Park as an example of the principle which had been adopted of levying taxes throughout the United Kingdom for the benefit of London alone. The amount spent upon Ireland or the provinces was very small indeed. The most serious complaint that had been made that evening was that made by an hon. Member with reference to Rotten Row, where it was said that no defence or shelter was provided for those anonymous individuals. He did not know that there was any necessity for spending more money upon conveniences for pretty horsebreakers, as he believed we were going quite fast enough without that.

SIR EDWARD DERING said, the hon. Member was misrepresenting what he had said.

MR. SCULLY said, he would apologize if he had misrepresented the hon. Baronet, but he believed he had literally interpreted what had fallen from him. The hon. Baronet did not name the unfortunate individuals, and he therefore concluded that they were anonymous. There was an Estimate of £594 for extending the horse ride in Battersea Park, and a little further down the hon. Baronet would find an item of £62 for public conveniences. He saw that there was included among the accounts an estimated expenditure of £1,051 upon Longford River. He did not know where Longford River was, nor had he been able to discover its locality. He knew a county of that name, however, in Ireland, but he did not believe that the sum was intended for the benefit of any place in that neighbourhood. They would see that the income they derived from the parks and pleasure gardens amounted to £3,527, while the expenditure upon them was £97,952, so that they were really in receipt of about 3½ per cent for their money. He could not understand how so much as £20,000 could be expended on Kew Gardens. But it was of no use to move a reduction, and, therefore, he would not attempt to obtain any. He despaired of having these enormous Votes for parks and horse rides and such trumpery cut down or rejected until some Member of position, such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, took the matter up.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he rose to object to an item of £25 for the construction of a plantation upon Primrose Hill. At present there was a very good view of Highgate from one side, and of Hampstead from the other, and he believed that the only result of the plantation would be to obstruct this view.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he desired to remind the Committee that Battersea Park was purchased with the public money, and that it was, therefore, the property of the public. If any portion of it had been devoted to the exclusive use of the Civil Service, such appropriation was, on that account, clearly unwarrantable. The expenditure on the parks was much heavier than it ought to be. It was an annual burden, and he believed that it would be difficult to show how so large a sum could be profitably expended.

MR. COX maintained that Kennington Common was not appropriated to the purpose for which it was intended—the recreation of the people and the benefit of the neighbourhood in which it was situated. Formerly, hundreds of children might be seen playing there and rejoicing in the fresh air. But now, if the hon. Member for Lambeth went to Kennington Park some hot day in July, he would see poor children running about on the hot gravel while the sheep engrossed the green grass.

MR. SCULLY said, that Battersea Park was of no more use to the constituents of the hon. Member for Lambeth than it was to the inhabitants of the County Cork, and if so it had better be shut up altogether. He thought that £1,600 was a large sum to pay for keeping up a park and for shutting out the children and giving playgrounds to the sheep there; and he had little doubt that if the hon. Member (Mr. W. Williams) were made head ranger he would keep the park in good order and save £1,400 a year.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that in laying out Battersea Park it could never have been contemplated that a toll bridge should be erected between it and the public; and if the building ground around it was to be let to advantage Battersea Bridge must be thrown open. He must say that the expenditure on the parks was rather extravagant. Ten years ago the Vote asked for was about £60,000, and now it was very nearly £100,000. He thought too much money was being spent in what he might term gardenizing these parks. In his opinion, it was not right to place beds of flowers in all sorts of incongruous places there. As to Primrose Hill, it would be much better to leave it in its present open condition.

LORD ELCHO asked what proportion of the total expenditure was caused by the wages and superannuation allowances of the park keepers. They were in many instances too old and infirm properly to maintain order, and, moreover, were not in the parks at night time. He would suggest that a considerable saving would be effected, and that the parks would be better kept, if they were handed over to the police.

MR. COWPER said, he could not admit that there was any undue expenditure whatever upon the Parks. The sum of £25,500 upon Hyde Park, St. James's, and the Green Park might seem a large one; but when hon. Members came to think of all that was necessary to be done they would find the expenditure exceedingly moderate. Out of the total he had just mentioned, £10,000 was appropriated to roads, for there were eight miles of roads in these parks, and thirty-five miles of walks. Another item was for repairs of lodges and railings, &c., £5,000. The constables cost £3,500 including everything, and they were less expensive than policemen who were employed at Kennington Park. These constables were always selected from men who had served in the army, a preference being given to those who had distinguished themselves and had obtained medals; but before their admission into the force a medical certificate was required of their being able-bodied men. The parochial rates amounted to £1,100, so that the money actually spent upon the grass lands and plantations was only £3,410 out of the £25,000. That was not a large sum, he thought, considering the necessity of keeping the grass and plantations in the order that was necessary. It seemed to be the impression that large sums were spent in cultivating flowers, but the recent creation of flower beds had given immense gratification at a small cost, and flowers were now necessary for the embellishment of the parks and for the enjoyment of the public. Last year the flowers in Hyde Park cost £600, including fuel, labour, and every expense; and he did not think that that was a large sum. With regard to Battersea Park he anticipated that their views as to future remuneration would be realized. Recently he had an advantageous offer for a considerable portion of the land adjoining Battersea Park, but he did not feel himself justified in accepting it without competition. At present a main sewer was being constructed there, which when completed would enhance the value of the land, and he intended to call for proposals for the letting. He could assure the Committee that all the regulations in the parks were made for the benefit of the public at large, and if at any time it could be shown that they operated injuriously towards the public he would be quite ready to re-consider them. As to the objection about the sheep, if none of those animals were put to graze in the parks, and the public were allowed always to walk on every part of the grass, the result would be that after a short time there would be no grass in those places of recreation. In Kennington Park he had set apart a portion of it exclusively for children to play in at all seasons. Of course they would destroy all the grass in that separate portion, but he supposed that sacrifice would be cheerfully submitted to in order to secure a play ground for children. In Battersea Park he had thought he had gone as far as he was justified in doing towards providing a cricket ground by making a portion of the park smooth and level, leaving it to clubs who wished to improve the ground to mow it, and otherwise keep it in good order for the game. Originally the exclusive use of a portion of it had been allowed to the Battersea Institution Club on those terms, and last year he had complied with an application from the Civil Service Cricket Club for the exclusive use of another portion of it on similar terms. He did not think that any wrong was done to the public by those arrangements, but if it could be shown that the privilege granted to these clubs was unfair towards other persons, he would be ready to re-consider the matter. He had been asked whether in the Regent's Park there was any payment for Crown rents. He had to answer that no part which paid Crown rents was included in the Estimates. The plantation which he proposed for Primrose Hill would be on the level ground and not on the height, and would relieve the monotony of the place. He agreed with the noble Lord that it would not be desirable to interfere with the hill itself. As to the arrangement proposed by the hon. Baronet for ladies who required shelter in rain, he would take the matter into consideration; but while anxious to contribute to the comfort of those who frequent the parks he must take care not to do anything to disfigure those places of public recreation, and there might be some question whether rustic roofs and iron sheds might not prove to be a disfigurement.

MR. MALINS said, he had been requested to call attention to the inconvenience caused in these days of late dinners by the closing so early as ten o'clock of the communication between the north and south sides of Hyde Park, which obliged persons wishing to go from Westbourne to Kensington to drive round by Park Lane.

MR. COX observed, that the right hon. Gentleman had not given an explanation about the arrangements in the Regent's and Victoria Parks.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, it would conduce to the comfort of many persons if more seats were placed in the parks, and if the seats had backs. [An hon. MEMBER: Bath chairs.] No, not Bath chairs; but chairs with backs.

MR. BUCHANAN asked whether there was any intention of finishing the portion of Kew Gardens nearest to Richmond?

MR. LYGON complained that too many of the park gates were closed and left without rangers to let visitors out immediately after the hour arrived for excluding the public from the enclosure in St. James's Park.

MR. COWPER said, he was very sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman had been interfered with in returning from his dinner party. [MR. MALINS: Not myself, but friends of mine.] He wished he could remedy the grievance complained of, but there was this difficulty—the park required to be opened at five o'clock in the morning to enable workmen going to work to pass across the park, and if the gatekeepers had to be up at that early hour it would be hard to ask them to remain up later than ten. Still it was a matter for consideration, and he should be very glad if the difficulty could be got over. The gatekeepers in St. James's Park were required to remain at the gates till ten minutes after they were shut, so that parties who had entered at one gate might be allowed to get out at another. In the case referred to, he supposed the constable had been negligent of his duty. He would make inquiry into the facts. The Estimates of the year would contain provision necessary for adding to the seats in the parks. A certain number were added every year; but he entirely disclaimed having placed seats there without backs. There might be a certain number of uncomfortable seats, but these were of an old construction, and the last pattern was a very easy one. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Finsbury, he might add that in Victoria Park one part was set apart for cricket matches and another for practice. In Regent's Park cricket was not allowed after eight o'clock in the morning. The suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow would receive attention.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would recommend the right hon. Gentleman not to carry out his design with regard to the plantation on Primrose Hill. The space was too contracted.

MR. COWPER said, the word "plantation" did not express his intention. He contemplated a group of trees which after a little time, when thinned, would stand out singly, and not interrupt people walking, but would contribute a little to break the dreary waste.

(5.) £22,144, to complete the sum for the Houses of Parliament.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished the Vote had come on at an early sitting, that he might have asked hon. Members to pay a visit to the Peers' robing-room, in order to examine and judge for themselves of what he might call one of the most noble specimens of modern art, and when he told them on their return that the painter of that great picture had been employed on it for six years and eight months at a remuneration not exceeding £500 a year, he would have asked them had he been adequately remunerated? It was said that Mr. Herbert, having entered into a contract, must be bound by it; but what were the facts of this case? According to the original estimate the work was to be done in fresco, which being rapidly executed Mr. Herbert calculated he would be adequately remunerated by the payment of £2,000 for each picture, because it would not occupy him more than twenty months. But the state of the frescoes in that House had attracted the attention of Parliament, and the Prince Consort, being struck with the superiority of the glass water process, requested Mr. Maclise to go to Berlin and inquire into the process. Mr. Maclise did so, and, having made himself practically and theoretically acquainted with it, came back to England and employed it in the prosecution of his own works. The Prince Consort was so satisfied with it and the report of Mr. Maclise, that he sent a jar of silicate of potash to Mr. Herbert, and requested him to make some experiments and satisfy himself. He did make those experiments, and so satisfied was he of the superiority of the new system over the old fresco, that he destroyed the whole of the work he had previously been engaged on, and commenced his new work on a totally different system. [The hon. Gentleman read a letter from Mr. Herbert to that effect.] Under these circumstances he thought that Mr. Herbert, having altogether changed his process at the request of the Prince Consort and adopted the new mode, the argument as to contract fell to the ground. The new process was very different from fresco. It admitted of every variety of detail, and Mr. Herbert had employed on his work an amount of time and labour which only those who saw it could adequately realize. He was authorized to say on the part of Mr. Herbert, and every man would believe the word of a great artist, that he had been conscientiously employed upon the work, not exclusively in painting, but in preparing the cartoon and studies from it, during the whole period he had mentioned. The frescoes in that House and at Munich, although only executed a few years, were decaying; and, taking into consideration the atmosphere of London, its damp and smuts, it was a point of economy to employ a different process, whereby the works produced would be as durable as the structure on which they were painted. Like most other Members, he must abnegate all notion of taste, but he would say that every person going into the room where Mr. Herbert's painting was exhibited felt himself in the presence of a great work. He read the opinion of a foreign artist on this subject, M. Carl Haag, who pronounced the picture, in composition, expression, drawing, colouring, keeping, and execution, worthy to be ranked with the works of any artist in history. Mr. Herbert for several years before he began that great work was making on an average about £1,850 per annum, and, being a man with a large family, if it had not been for his previous accumulations he would have found it difficult to get on. For the reproduction of one figure alone in this great picture he had been offered £1,000. For his picture of the "Railway Station" Mr. Frith had got £8,700. Mr. Holman Hunt had received £5,500 for his "Christ in the Temple," and, after the great success he had achieved, Mr. Herbert might reasonably expect to make large sums if he gave up working for the country. Mr. Herbert, however, was not the least influenced by money, but was devoted to his art, and most anxious to continue his work, though the country ought not to take advantage of that. He had already finished two other sketches to adorn those walls, and if the justice of Parliament should allow the room to be finished, it would be an honour to the nation and a delight to those who saw it. He was told that there was some difficulty, inasmuch as other gentlemen might have a claim for additional remuneration if Mr. Herbert's claim were allowed. No doubt Mr. Maclise had a strong claim. Before he undertook to work for the nation, he was making £2,000 a year, and at one time as much as £4,000. He had been working now conscientiously, and he (Mr. Gregory) might add incessantly, for the public for eight years, and the whole sum which he would receive would be £7,000. True he had made no application for a further payment—and such was the generous, almost chivalrous character of Mr. Maclise, that he would work for nothing rather than apply. But Mr. Maclise had not a young family to support, and Mr. Herbert had. If Mr. Maclise, owing to his peculiar circumstances, had not made any application for additional remuneration, it was hard that Mr. Herbert should be debarred therefore from receiving that to which he had a strong claim. We had now got at length a great man; and they should keep him and attach him to the nation. Cheap art was the worst of all art, and if they aimed at obtaining productions of art they should be worthy of the country. He entreated the Committee not to ask sacrifices from an artist, such as they ought not to accept, even if they were offered; and, above all, he entreated them not, for the sake of a miserable economy, to allow it to be said, that the nation which professed to reward art was not sufficiently rich to reward an artist for a great work, but turned him over to the picture dealers, who could adequately reward him. He (Mr. Gregory) could not, in accordance with the forms of the House, move an addition to the Vote, or even its postponement, but he was convinced that the tone of the discussion would be such as to convince the Government that Parliament was ready to behave with justice and liberality in the matter.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that the case was not in his opinion one to be brought forward in forma pauperis; it was not a question of charity; it was not because Mr. Herbert had a large family that he should receive additional remuneration. It was a simple question of justice. His hon. Friend had understated rather than overstated the case; for Mr. Herbert had been at work for six years, and taking into account the cost of materials and incidental expenses he had scarcely realized £350 a year, and yet nearly the whole of his time had been devoted to that work, which was a most magnificent specimen of art. Were they to allow a gentleman, who had been previously realizing £2,000 or £3,000 a year, to receive such a miserable pittance? The House must remember that this was a great experiment, and that independently of the work itself another one had been destroyed in order to carry out the experiment which had been approved by the Prince Consort. The whole payment for the picture would be £3,500; and he thought that if the amount were doubled they would have a magnificent work at a very reasonable figure. The question was, whether they would pay fairly and justly for the most perfect work which adorned the walls of Parliament.

MR. BRIGHT said, that the discussion had proceeded as if some blame ought to be cast upon the Government in the matter, but he suspected that the right hon. Gentleman below (Mr. Gladstone) and his Colleagues agreed in the main with the hon. Member for Galway. Evidently his views as to the justice of the case met with the approval of the Committee. With respect to the measure of that justice, he (Mr. Bright) did not pretend to know a great deal about art; but when he went into the room containing that great picture he felt that he had not known until then that there was a painter in this country who could execute a work of art such as that. That, he believed, was the impression produced by it on the minds of a large number more competent than himself to judge. He was not in favour of a costly decoration of the Houses of Parliament, for he thought the purpose a mistaken one. Moreover, he was not sure that the picture under discussion was in a room sufficiently large to do it justice, while the cost of a room fitted in a creditable manner would be large, and he would have preferred that so much had not been spent in decorating the building. The expenditure, however, was of a kind the most harmless, and to many perhaps the most gratifying, to which a portion of the public money could be devoted; and he would, therefore, make no complaint on that point. If, however, the walls of the Houses of Parliament were to be decorated, they ought to be decorated in the best and most lasting manner. It might matter little to those then sitting in that House whether the picture lasted a few years or a hundred; but there would come a time, if it were done in a manner that was not durable, when everybody would regret that the Parliament of this day was not more attentive to the proper expenditure of its money, and did not take care to have these costly works executed in a way that was more likely to endure than ordinary frescoes appeared to do. Then if this picture, so great as it was acknowledged to be, was executed in a manner that would give it what was meant by the word eternity in relation to any work of art, should not the House behave honourably, generously, and justly to a man who had so much distinguished himself, and done that which in all probability would attract thousands in times to come to visit that building? Having known Mr. Herbert more or less intimately for years, he believed that he had always exhibited a devotion to his art amounting to perfect enthusiasm, and that if he only got a crust he must paint by the very nature of his constitution and mind. That was, however, no reason why, having been drawn from his private practice to paint for the public, the public should not fairly, honestly, and generously pay him. Therefore, although no member of the Committee could move a larger Vote, it was to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would take the subject into consideration in that spirit. He was afraid to name the sum to which the Vote ought to be made up, but he thought the House would consider it no extravagance or waste of public money, but a just and moderate consideration of Mr. Herbert's claims, if that gentleman were to receive not less than £5,000 for that picture.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, that having seen many famous fresco paintings, he wished to express his belief that a more magnificent work of art than that of Mr. Herbert existed nowhere in the world. He could not quite agree with his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) that they were not to consider the claims which Mr. Herbert's family had upon him, because it was their duty to encourage a great artist, and relieve his mind from those pecuniary anxieties with respect to those dependent on him, which had depressed the genius of many a great painter. The amount named by the hon. Gentleman who spoke last would be a very moderate sum to pay for a work that would shed the greatest honour on the country which possessed it.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he believed, from the experience he had had in these matters, that the sum which had been named was not one half of the price which that painting would fetch to-morrow if taken to Christie's for sale. Mr. Herbert had refused many commissions simply on account of his devotion to that picture, and he considered that both Mr. Herbert and Mr. Maclise were entitled to the greatest consideration on the part of the Committee.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he believed that the work of Mr. Herbert embraced in itself all that there was in ancient art of grandeur, dignity, and elevation of conception, with a delicacy of detail, and a precision and accuracy of execution which could not be surpassed by the most distinguished modern painter. He therefore cordially concurred in the suggestion which had been thrown out for an increased remuneration. The country had at length obtained a picture which would hand down to posterity a noble monument of what it could achieve in the way of art; let it not become evidence against it of shabbiness and parsimony.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there were a number of considerations connected with the matter which placed Her Majesty's Government in a position of considerable difficulty. He entirely shared in the feelings which hon. Gentlemen had expressed—as far as he might presume to have an opinion on the subject—with regard both to the character of the particular work of art under discussion and to the character of Mr.

Herbert. The atmosphere of a deliberative assembly was not, perhaps, the most favourable one for the practical decision of these questions. It was much more common within those walls to hear the professors of art criticized with extreme severity than eulogized in terms of warmth and enthusiasm. He did not grudge one word that had been said about Mr. Herbert. On the contrary, not a syllable could be spoken, in praise of his genius and devotion to his work which he was not ready to echo. He could wish that as generous feelings had been evinced to every other artist on every occasion. But there were some—some, perhaps, then alive, and others dead—who had not always been equally fortunate in the treatment they had received in that House. He thought a very wise course was pursued by the Government of the day when it first approached the subject of the decoration of the Houses of Parliament with great paintings and statues. He might, in passing, observe that it could have been wished that the same spirit of wisdom and prudence had characterized all the proceedings taken in connection with the erection of the buildings themselves. Experience had proved the wisdom of both the executive Government and the House of Commons, divesting themselves of the responsibility of a task which he did not think either very well fitted to perform—namely, to carry through in detail the business of choosing artists, of choosing subjects, of appreciating the execution of their work, and estimating the remuneration which should be awarded for it. The House would recollect that the whole of those duties were delegated to a Commission, by whom arrangements were carried out in a manner much more satisfactorily than would have been the case if they had been content to trust these matters to the ordinary machinery of the Government acting under its responsibility to Parliament. The result of considering that question in the department, and the effect also of listening to its discussion that evening, convinced him that the subject lay beyond them for its satisfactory settlement. There was no difficulty at all, if they were dealing with an isolated case, in giving way for once to the feelings they entertained. But he must observe that if they were to compete with the picture dealer they must restrict the scale of their enterprises of that description. If they were to compete with the picture dealer they must not attempt to cover thousands and thousands of feet with works of art to be paid for at the picture dealer's rate. The House would observe that very extensive commissions had been given, and that very large works had been executed, some of which were on their walls. It was not, he might add, one case with which they had to deal, but a great number of cases. Mr. Herbert himself, if he were not mistaken, had informed him that Mr. Dyce had left on their walls works, on which animadversions had been made, two or three times the value of the money which he had received. In one respect he must object to what had been said in reference to the devotion of Mr. Herbert to his art. Devotion to art was, he was happy to say, no uncommon sentiment among the artists of this country, and the delicacy of feeling which accompanied that devotion, and which was to artists like the air which they breathed, very much complicated the difficulties of dealing with the question. What the Government proposed to do under the circumstances was that the sum of £1,500 should be paid to Mr. Herbert, in addition to the sum of £2,000 which he had received, but that that £1,500 should not be regarded as a final settlement of the matter, but should be paid rather as an instalment in regard to the number of pictures painted than those about to be painted. He might further observe that it was the wish of the Government to form a small Commission of persons judiciously selected for the purpose, who would go carefully into the whole question in reference to contracts on the one hand and performance on the other, and who would endeavour to advise the Government impartially on a view of the whole case as to the course which ought to be adopted. Of course, some delay must occur before such an adjustment could take place as would bring about a fair and just award; but that delay would be as nothing to the difficulties into which the House might rush if under the influence of feeling they were to proceed to a decision which would be taken, not on the whole, but on a single portion of the case.

LORD ELCHO said, he conceived that the hon. Member for Galway had done but a simple act of justice to Mr. Herbert in bringing before the House the claims of Mr. Herbert, and he thanked him for having afforded the Government and the House an opportunity of doing that artist justice. But there were other cases in which justice ought to be done, as for instance in the case of Mr. Maclise. He thought the question of remuneration having arisen, the time had come for taking stock, as it were, of the works of art executed for the Houses of Parliament, and that larger powers should be given to the proposed Commission than the Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplated.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the case of Mr. Herbert did not stand upon the same grounds as those of the other artists. Finding that the process which he had at first adopted was not calculated to preserve the pictures, he had destroyed 400 feet of painting in order to adopt another and a better process. There was this peculiar circumstance with reference to Mr. Herbert—that his work was to be regarded as œuvre de l'âge. It was a work of super-eminent merit, that it went beyond anything we had seen in this country, and therefore he thought it stood apart from the cases that had been mentioned in connection with it. He did not think the proposed Commission would meet the merits of the case. The country ought to deal generously with Mr. Herbert, who had thrown his whole soul into the subject, and had produced a really great and truly sublime work, one about which there could not be two opinions.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he must protest against the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that certain hon. Members had treated the late Mr. Dyce with unfairness. He had no wish to cast a slur upon the memory of Mr. Dyce, but he could not forget that fourteen years ago Mr. Dyce undertook to paint certain frescoes, and that in 1857, though he had received the whole amount, the frescoes were not done. On more than one occasion the First Commissioner had admitted that Mr. Dyce was in the wrong, and though no one would propose that any money should be claimed from the representatives of Mr. Dyce, hon. Members were not to be blamed for calling attention to the fact that a certain contract had not been fulfilled. He cordially concurred in all the eulogiums which had been passed upon the great work of Mr. Herbert, and he had the authority of that gentleman for saying that unless he received something like £5,000 he would never again put his brush upon the walls of the Houses of Parliament. [Cries of "No, no!"]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the hon. Gentleman must be labouring under some mistake; it was impossible that Mr. Herbert could have said that unless he received £5,000 he would never again lay his brush to the walls of the Houses of Parliament.

MR. MALINS said, he was also convinced that there must be a mistake. He had seen the picture Mr. Herbert was working at, and whatever he might do with regard to any other work of art, he did not think Mr. Herbert meant the remark to apply to the work he was then engaged upon, but it applied to any other work of art which he might be asked to execute.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, that Mr. Herbert was in the room when he saw his great picture, and, pointing to the other end of the apartment, he remarked that his ambition was to cover it with a representation of Our Lord delivering a Sermon on the Mount. Certainly that did not indicate that he would be influenced in any way whatever by the amount of his remuneration.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought that the hon. Member for Taunton must have misunderstood Mr. Herbert. That gentleman might have said that, with such payment as he had hitherto received, he could not, with a due regard to those who depended upon him, continue the great sacrifices he had made while producing the wonderful work which struck all beholders with delight and admiration.

MR. HEYGATE said, the discussion was another illustration of the old adage that it never rained but it poured. When the House of Commons was disposed to be liberal and eulogistic it was so with a vengeance. He wished to call attention to the want of ventilation in the Ladies' Gallery, which could only be likened to the Black Hole of Calcutta. There was no possibility of obtaining air except by opening a door, which created a draught by which the ladies were almost blown to pieces. He hoped some improvement would be introduced as soon as possible.

MR. COWPER remarked that the ill-ventilation of the remote corner to which the eyes of hon. Members were so often turned was owing to a defect of structure, but he had no doubt that every effort would be made to promote the comfort and convenience of the ladies. With regard to Mr. Dyce, he was a man of great celebrity as well as of high honour, and he felt deeply the observations made in that House as to his not having executed the works he contracted for. He was certainly underpaid for the work he did, and was anxious to be released from his engagement, and offered to return the money he had received if released. He (Mr. Cowper) did not feel at liberty to accept that offer, because he thought that what the country wanted was not his money, but that he should complete the works he had commenced, and he feared it was owing to the great exertion he made to execute these works that his illness was increased, and ultimately proved fatal.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to know whether the grating in front of the Ladies' Gallery could not be removed. If it were removed the ladies would have some fresh air, and he was sure Gentlemen would not be sorry to see them.

MR. GREGORY said, he cordially concurred in the suggestions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Such questions ought, as far as possible, to be transferred from the House of Commons to a more competent tribunal. He also admitted that it would be invidious to deal specially with Mr. Herbert's case, when other gentlemen had similar claims on their consideration. He was unwilling to raise a squabble over the grave of a great artist, and should, therefore, pass over the Chancellor of the Exchequer's remarks on another topic, merely saying that he did not use stronger language regarding it than the First Commissioner of Works. He did not base Mr. Herbert's claim on the fact that he had a large family; he mentioned that circumstance only to show that Mr. Herbert could not afford to make those sacrifices for the sake of art, which his generous enthusiasm would otherwise doubtless lead him to do.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he was sorry to have misunderstood the hon. Gentleman.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

LORD CHELMSFORD stated that he had within the last half hour had placed in his hands a copy of the Return containing the answers given by the County Court Judges to questions on the subject of imprisonment for debt; and he could not help thinking that Return ought to have been laid on the table before the Bill of his noble and learned Friend had been introduced. But as the information contained in this paper was of a most important character, their Lordships were certainly not in a condition to deal with the Bill until they had made themselves masters of this Return. He, therefore, appealed to his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to postpone the second reading of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would most readily agree that the second reading of the Bill should be postponed till the first day after the Whitsuntide recess.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.
WAR CONTRIBUTIONS ON JUTLAND.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I rise to put to the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs the Question I communicated to him yesterday, as to the understanding the Conference may have come to with respect to the collection of the War Contributions imposed by Prussia on Jutland. The excessive amount of these contributions and the extreme severity with which they have been collected—or attempted to be collected—have produced a universally painful impression, and have added greatly to the indignation that must always accompany the recollection of the bombardment of Sønderborg. I should do injustice to the noble Earl if I did not believe that he entirely participates in the general feeling on that subject. My Lords, we should very ill judge of the pressure of those contributions on Jutland if we did not take into consideration the condition and circumstances of that country. It is not a wealthy country; it is, on the contrary, a comparatively sterile country—it has no large towns—it has no manufactures—it has very little of cereal produce. It is one great grazing ground, interrupted by sands and by water. The few articles sold in the towns are solely produced for the use of the agricultural population. The large proprietors commonly live on their own estates in the midst of their people; their houses are surrounded by buildings of immense extent, which are necessary to cover the stock during the severe winter, and the destruction of a farm in that country is like the destruction of a town in this. The ruin of one of the proprietors is the utter ruin of all those who depend upon him, for they have no others to go to for employment. It is a population that one would have supposed could not have excited a spirit of revenge and animosity on the part of any enemy. They are singularly simple and innocent. They can have very little knowledge of the long diplomatic discussions that have taken place between Germany and their own Government. They are not persons to attend to political discussions. This only they know—that the Germans have come at last, after long threatening, to attempt to take from their country two valuable provinces that have belonged to Denmark for 400 years; and with the spirit of a brave, loyal people they spring forward for its defence, and send their sons, little instructed in military arts, to suffer and die in the defence of their country. There they have obtained for themselves immortal honour by their perseverance and their submission to every hardship and privation of war. But, unfortunately for themselves, the people of Jutland are a free people. They possess the most popular form of electoral franchise. It is to their great credit that they have not abused it; but in the eyes of the despotic Powers of Germany that is a crime not to be forgiven. It is impossible to conceal from ourselves the fact—indeed, it is admitted by Herr von Bismarck—that this is a war against freedom carried on by Prussia and the other despotic Powers of Germany. Forgetting that they dominate in Venetia, and are masters of a large Polish population, they make this war in the name of nationality—they bring their might to bear against right, their strength against weakness; and, above all, they endeavour to overwhelm by their military strength all the resistance that can be brought against them by a thoroughly free people. My Lords, I say it is might against right. The war is altogether an unjust war. The noble Earl himself admits that it is unjust, because the demands which were made by the allied Powers were conceded. But I go beyond that. I cannot understand how any right can grow out of a wrong, and the whole of these diplomatic transactions out of which this supposed right arises originated in this—that the German Powers being admitted into Holstein on the requisition of Denmark to restore order in that province which belongs to the German Confederation, and finding themselves in military possession of the country, took advantage of their presence to force Denmark to agree to conditions with regard to Schleswig, which is not German. My Lords, I cannot understand how any country can acquire a vested interest in the bad government of another; and yet it is this which the Germans pretend to have acquired by the diplomatic transactions of '52, claiming a right to interfere in the administration of Schleswig, and to prevent the adoption of measures of reform in that province. It is therefore a war of thorough injustice. But, my Lords, Prussia has had other views in this war. She has desired to give a certain appearance of reputation to her army, and on that account men are to be shot at instead of targets. She has accordingly practised on the weak with the whole power of her artillery and musketry, and thousands of loyal subjects of the King of Denmark are

My Lords, I look with loathing on this war. Prussia should recollect that it was the sense of the contumely and wrong which she suffered at the hands of France which roused her spirit in 1813, and enabled her to redeem the character which had been acquired by her people fifty years before. The same sense of contumely and wrong will remain for ever in the minds of the Danish people. Prussia has created a force of 1,800,000 persons on her extreme flank, which will for ever hang upon her communications, and at all times will endanger her position when she is engaged in war. My Lords, the day will come—and it may not be distant—when Prussia may call on other Powers for help; but they will sympathize with those whom she is now oppressing, and she will be left in her difficulty unaided, unpitied, and despised. My Lords, I am unfortunately old enough to remember the great atrocity committed by Prussia in 1806, when she received at the hands of Napoleon Hanover, which he had not by any international law any right to give her. I recollect the indignant language of Mr. Fox at that time, reprobating her conduct, which he described as combining all that was contemptible in servility with all that was odious in rapacity. Servile in the presence of Russia, rapacious in the attack upon Denmark, Prussia still maintains her bad pre-eminence. But, my Lords, it is not only through ambition—it is not only to teach her army to fight—it is for lucre that this war is waged; but I do trust that the Conference, acting in the spirit of justice, has looked into these transactions, and that in its determination with respect to these contributions imposed by Prussia it has recollected that, while war has its rights, humanity has its rights also. My Lords, I will now put to the noble Earl these Questions—namely, 1st, Whether it is understood by the Conference that war contributions imposed before the armistice was known and announced in Jutland can be collected during the suspension of arms; 2nd, Whether any war contribution imposed after the armistice was known, but before the suspension of arms commenced, namely, on the 12th, can be collected; and 3rd, Whether any new contributions can be imposed during the suspension of arms?

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I feel it to be my duty not to make any remarks upon the eloquent speech which the noble Earl has just made. It is, I think, incumbent on me rather to endeavour to come to some understanding which may lead ultimately to peace. And in answering the Question of the noble Earl with respect to the present suspension of arms, I beg to say that I do not at all depart from the rule which I thought it my duty to lay down for myself on a previous occasion—namely, that, pending the Conference, I should not make explanations as to what takes place at its sittings. However, with regard to the suspension of arms, I think there is fairly an exception. The Conference has agreed—and this should be an answer to the noble Earl's last question—the Conference has agreed that during the suspension of arms there shall not be levied by the allied troops in Jutland, or wherever else they occupy positions, any contributions of war, and that, on the contrary, those troops will pay for the articles they may require. The Conference did not lay down any rule with regard to contributions that were previously imposed; but in my view the spirit of the article would be that the allied troops would cease to levy any contributions of war. That appears to be the fair spirit and meaning of the Conference. The Conference, anxious to stop the effusion of blood, and anxious to protect the people from these contributions of war, having decided on the main point, left the commanders of the naval and military forces engaged on each side to settle the details with one another. It seems to me that I am not authorized in saying more. But with respect to the first two questions, they have been decided by the Conference. I may, however, further mention, that having made representations to the Allied Governments with respect to the exaction of war contributions, an answer was given on the part of the Austrian commander, to the effect that it was the custom of all troops during war—including the English army—to levy military contributions, not only in kind, but in money, to defray the expenses to which they are put. Now, whatever may be the case with Continental armies, that, I believe, has not been the practice of the English army. During the Duke of Wellington's campaigns in the Peninsula the utmost care was taken to allow it, but all that the troops required was paid for; and the Austrian General is quite mistaken in supposing that the practice adopted in Jutland has any authority or precedent in the conduct of the British army.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I am exceedingly sorry to hear from the noble Earl that the Conference has not used the most extreme precision of language in prescribing the directions to be given respecting the collection of war contributions. It appears to me that there is nothing precise in their language, but that there is merely an understanding on the part of the noble Earl, that no new contributions are to be levied during the armistice.

EARL RUSSELL: The agreement is not to levy contributions of war: it is not merely that no "new contributions" are to be levied.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: It so happens that the contribution of 650,000 thalers was imposed on the very day on which the Conference last sat—namely, the 9th; and it seems to me to have been imposed in fraud of the Conference, and with the knowledge that the Conference was to sit on that day, in order that it might be included under the category of contributions imposed before instead of after, the decisions of the Conference, COMMITTEE NEGATIVED.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD LYTTTELTON presented petitions from the Venerable Archdeacon Thorp, of Bristol, and the Rev. J. F. Mackarness, Prebendary of Exeter Cathedral, against the Bill, and praying for the severance of canonries from all University offices. The petition of Archdeacon Thorp prayed their Lordships to take into their early consideration the recommendation made by Bishop Monk in a letter to the effect, that "It would be a beneficial change to transfer the patronage of these canonries as proposed by the Government of Lord John Russell from the Chancellor to the Prime Minister;" and secondly, the expediency of providing for the severance, on the next avoidance, of canonries from headships of colleges and professorships not directly connected with instruction in religious learning in the two ancient Universities; and thirdly, the expediency of humbly recommending to Her Majesty to take into consideration the recommendation of the Cathedral Commissioners with a view to enacting such reforms in the cathedral bodies as shall be found expedient; and lastly, he humbly prays their Lordships' House not to consent to the said Bill for annexing permanently a cathedral canonry to the Greek Professorship of Oxford, nor to any other measure by which cathedral endowments may be diverted from the legitimate and still beneficial purposes of their foundation. The Rev. W. Mackarness in his petition prayed their Lordships "not to pass the said Bill, or at least so to modify it as to separate the proposed professional stipend from the office and function of a canon residentiary in any cathedral church." A learned and influential Commission had pronounced a similar opinion in three Reports, but he was sorry to say that, up to the present time, not the slightest attention had been paid to their recommendation. Not long ago, the present Government, in reply to a question, frankly confessed that they had not taken the trouble to think about the matter at all, and he must admit that no great public feeling existed to stir them into action. Under those circumstances, though he still retained the opinion that more diocesan work should be imposed upon the cathedral bodies, he was not prepared to offer any opposition to the present Bill, which he regarded merely as one additional step in a direction which Parliament and Government had long followed. He was far from blaming the University of Oxford for having refused to endow the Greek Professorship, because it was bound by express statute to take into consideration the question of soundness of doctrine in professors; but Parliament was otherwise situated, and it might very fairly make provision for the only remaining unendowed Regius Professorship to be found at the Universities, wholly apart from any personal question.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he wished to make some remarks on the Bill, which ought to have been addressed to their Lordships on a former occasion; and his apology was that, on communicating with his noble Friend the Chancellor of the University (the Earl of Derby), he was induced to think that the measure would give satisfaction to the University, and therefore he was then reluctant to offer any opposition to it. He was very unwilling, however, to allow the Bill to go into Committee without expressing his views with respect to it. He did not deny that the present state of affairs, in connection with the Regius Professorship of Greek, was almost a reproach to the University; and all must agree that it was desirable, if they could do so properly, to add to the scanty stipend which he at present was paid; but he (Lord Chelmsford) objected to the manner in which the Bill proposed to augment it, namely, by annexing to it a canonry which was in the gift of the Lord Chancellor as a perpetual endowment. They could not disguise from themselves that although this was a measure of a general nature, and intended for all times, yet it had been introduced to meet the difficulty that had arisen with respect to a particular individual. He was far from wishing to say anything in disparagement of the eminent Professor who now occupied the chair, whose scholarship and attainments he fully acknowledged; but if the question were, whether he was a fit and proper person to be appointed to a canonry, he thought it could not be doubted that different opinions might be entertained upon the subject; and he presumed that his noble and learned Friend on the Wool-sack, if he had the opportunity, would consider whether it would be a proper thing to appoint Professor Jowett to a vacant canonry. Now, by this Bill, his noble and learned Friend proposed to shift the responsibility from himself and throw it on the University. He could not help doubting whether canonries were appropriate remunerations for professorships, because he thought they ought to be reserved for persons who had served the Church long and faithfully, and had a very extended pastoral care, or who possessed great theological attainments which had been entirely devoted to the service of the Church. The rewards for deserving clergymen were but few, and those few had of late years been considerably abridged. He quite concurred with the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey), who stated, on the second reading of the Bill, that its effect would be to narrow the choice of proper persons to fill the professorial chairs; although it had been stated, on the other hand, that no inconvenience had resulted in the change with regard to the Professorships of Hebrew and Greek at Cambridge, to which canonries at Ely had been annexed. His noble Friend, however, pointed out that if the Act had been in existence in Porson's time he never could have sat in the professorial chair, because he was not in holy orders; and the effect of annexing canonries to professorial chairs would be either to deprive them of the selection of the person best qualified for the office, or it would induce persons who otherwise would not be so disposed to enter the Church and to take holy orders with a view to a professorship, and after six years they would be qualified to accept high appointments in the Church to which they might be wholly unsuited. But was it so that no inconvenience had been sustained from the annexation of the canonry of Ely to the Regius Professorship of Cambridge? At the time of the passing of the Act, Dr. Lee, who was a man of considerable learning, who had devoted the whole of his life to study, who was a most distinguished Oriental scholar, and who was in every respect the person best qualified for the office, held a stall in Bristol Cathedral. This being more valuable than the canonry attached to the Regius Professorship, he was obliged to give up that chair, and the immediate effect of the Act was to deprive the University of the services as professor of a man most eminently qualified to fill that office. His noble and learned Friend on the Wool-being extremely anxious to obviate any difficulties that might arise upon this subject, had offered a bribe to the University by giving to the heads of Colleges the appointment to the canonry on their again endowing the Regius Professorship. Now, he quite agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) who said on a former occasion that if the Government wished to induce the colleges to endow the professorship by offering to annex a canonry, that it would be better at once to transfer the appointment of the Regius Professor to the University, and it being their own appointment they would be prepared to endow it; the only objection to their endowing it at present being that it was not in their gift but in that of the Crown, and that they were unable to apply any of their funds towards it; such an arrangement would no doubt put an end to all the difficulties of the subject. He objected to the Bill because he could not disguise from himself that it had been introduced for the purpose of meeting a difficulty that had arisen with regard to a particular individual, and because he thought that canonries ought not to be annexed to professorial chairs, but given to deserving clergymen.

LORD TAUNTON said, that with all respect for the governing body of the University, he was bound, after their recent behaviour in this very case, to protest against the suggestion which had been made as to the transfer of the chair from the Church to the University. It would be injurious to the University, and most injurious to the professorship itself. He considered that the objections to the Bill were very serious. He was anxious that the present injustice to Professor Jowett and the scandal to the University should be brought to a close; but he could not approve the arrangement proposed in the Bill. It was not right that a layman, whatever his attainments, should be excluded from the Greek chair, and that tuition of this kind should be confined to the clergy. This was the adoption of a permanent measure to remedy a temporary grievance, and it might lead to permanent evils. He therefore thought that, on the whole, he should feel bound, if an opportunity were given him, to vote against the further progress of the Bill. He was sensible of the inconveniences of the present state of things in the University of Oxford; but, having considered both sides of the question, the objections to the Bill appeared to him to preponderate. He did not like to take away one of the few prizes given to a body by no means overpaid—he meant the working clergy. The whole thing seemed to be what was vulgarly called a “botch,” for it was an attempt to attach to a professorship which ought to be properly remunerated, a payment of another description. The University had received a large remission of taxation to the amount of £12,000 or £16,000 a year, and he therefore trusted that that body, having received such an advantage, would consider the fitness of attaching an adequate salary to the Greek Professorship. He had brought his mind to the conviction that, on the whole, the present Bill ought not to receive their Lordships’ assent.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he must confess he felt himself in a position of difficulty with regard to this Bill, and to the position which he had the honour to hold in the University. Their Lordships would remember that on the Motion for the second reading, finding no other noble Lord disposed to offer observations with respect to it, he felt it right, in his peculiar position, to state at once the ground on which he conceived he was not entitled to take upon himself the responsibility of advising the rejection of the measure. At the same time, he stated the strong objections which he felt to the measure. These grounds of objection were, on the one side, that the proposed arrangement would necessarily confine the professorship in question to a clergyman, and on the other hand would deprive the working clergy of one of the few prizes remaining to them, and would extend the principle of separating cathedral honours from anything connected with cathedral residence. At the same time, he did not feel himself authorized to move the rejection of the Bill on the Motion for the second reading; and for this reason—that he was given to understand that the arrangement would settle a very delicate and difficult question in a satisfactory manner—satisfactory in the sense that it would relieve the University from a great difficulty. The measure was brought forward, as he understood, on the avowed and only ground that the Greek Professorship was not at the present moment adequately endowed by the University of Oxford. In the discussion which took place on the second reading, he was somewhat favourably impressed with the suggestion thrown out by his noble Friend (the Duke of Marlborough); but when he came to the consideration of it he felt the difficulties of acceding to it which had been mentioned by his noble Friend. It was one thing to vest the patronage in the University at large, and another thing to vest it in a certain portion of the University. He felt a strong objection to place the canonry and professorship in a position to be scrambled for by a general canvass among Convocation. There was a proposal some years ago to endow the Regius Professorship of Greek, and that the patronage should be placed in a small board, of which three were to be nominated by the Crown and two selected from persons holding particular offices in the University. It was thought that in that way the rights of the Crown, and the interests of learning, might have been jointly protected. That proposal, however, was not felt to be satisfactory to either the Crown or the University, but certainly not to the University. But a proposal of this nature was different from one to place it in the University at large. He thought his noble Friend (Lord Taunton), who had just sat down, was rather hard on the University when he said that in his opinion the University ought to provide for the endowment out of their own revenues; because now that the attention of the University had been drawn to the matter, he believed that the University would not be found indisposed to make a proper provision for the Greek Professorship if it were not for the strong objections entertained by the majority of the University to the teaching and opinions of the individual now holding that professorship; and, so far as he could learn, it would be hopeless, as long as that individual should hold it, to make any application to the University to endow it; not because the professorship was not inadequately endowed, but because the University objected to do any thing which might be taken to indicate an apparent acquiescence in opinions to which they objected. He would not take upon himself the responsibility of proposing the rejection of the Bill to their Lordships; but if it should go into Committee, and should the clause suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack be adopted, he should propose a provision founded on that clause; but seeing that the difficulty was on the one hand temporary, and that the objections to the Bill were of a permanent character, it would be very satisfactory if, after the discussion which the Bill had undergone, time were given to the University of Oxford and to Parliament more fully to consider the measure. He thought that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who had undoubtedly proposed the Bill with the sincere desire of serving the interests of the University and the public, would do well voluntarily to postpone pressing a measure, to which on all sides there was great objection, and on which, if a division took place, it was quite clear the decision would not be guided by party views or political considerations.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if he were asked by their Lordships whether he considered the present Bill the best mode of proceeding to endow the Greek Professorship at Oxford, he should certainly answer that it was not. The best mode undoubtedly would be for the University to do that which justice and reason pointed out, and which, in fact, good faith demanded; for the University had received great gifts from the Crown with the understanding that the duty of endowing public professorships should be fulfilled on their part. The duty of the University was not that of superintending the system of private instruction which was carried on in the colleges, but of adequately endowing for the benefit of the whole community within its walls—as the name of University implied—public professorships. A statute had been lately brought into the University—and he alluded to the subject reluctantly, because at the very onset he had earnestly deprecated the introduction of personal allusions into the controversy, if controversy it could be called—and it was therein declared that in passing the statute the University was not to be considered in any manner whatever as having sanctioned, acquiesced in, or approved the peculiar opinions of Professor Jowett. Unfortunately, the hopes which were then raised were not fulfilled; but the avowed reason given by the majority for refusing to endow the professorship was, that it was the duty of the Crown to endow it. He believed he was perfectly right in stating, on the authority of the public prints, that in the language used by the majority that was assigned as the prominent reason for the adverse vote given. He had accepted that explanation in all sincerity, and in order to remove the difficulty had introduced the present Bill. There were, he admitted, at the outset grave and considerable difficulties. He had not the least objection to discuss them. But let them proceed in all honesty:—if they disliked the Bill, let them consider whether it ought to be rejected or not; but if their Lordships were of opinion that the Bill should pass as the smaller of two evils, why, then he would beg of them to swallow the dose with a good grace. Let them come now to the consideration of the main merits of the case. The noble Lord who had presented petitions on the subject (Lord Lytton) would pardon him for saying that he thought if he had read one of them he would not have presented it. He had no doubt that the petitioner was a clergyman entitled to extreme respect; but the first part of his petition was full of lachrymose complaints because his own merits had not been rewarded by a canonry, and the second contained an expression of his extreme indignation that part of the preferments of the Church should be tied up to a Professorship at Oxford, with the almost certain result of branding the office with the stamp of comparative mediocrity. The reverend petitioner was of opinion that an office which would be confined to ecclesiastics would be branded with the stamp of comparative mediocrity! He (the Lord Chancellor) had not the smallest apprehension that if it should happen once out of 500 times that it would be proper to have a layman professor, the difficulty would be met by the University or by the Crown. If the House would permit this Bill to go into Committee, he would take the opportunity of explaining, even for the second time, the nature of one or two Amendments which he intended to propose. He proposed, if any one college should endow the Professorship of Greek, that the canonry with which for the time being the professor should be endowed should be attached to the headship of the college. In introducing that subject, he had referred to the new statute of the College of Corpus Christi. Corpus Christi College was one of the earliest foundations of the University, and the founder, in the quaint language of the time, expressed his desire that part of the revenues of the College should be devoted to the endowment of public lecturers in Latin and Greek. If the College revenues increased sufficiently, the Professorship of Latin was to be endowed with £600 a year; and he (the Lord Chancellor) consequently thought that the endowment of the Greek Professorship should in like manner be £600. Now it would, he thought, be a small thing to carry that statute into effect; and in the expectation that the authorities would do so he had introduced a clause which would have the effect of annexing the canonry to the headship of the College, if the College should carry out the statute by endowing the Professorship with the appointed income of £600 a year. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) had said that those canonries ought to be the reward of great services in the Church; and in that he (the Lord Chancellor) quite concurred. He quite admitted that they might be appropriated by a new law and by new regulations to more useful purposes than they served at present. But he must take them as they were, as they had been for a considerable period, and, so far as could be seen, as they were likely to remain; and, he asked, was there any purpose by which the cause of religion or education could be better promoted, by which meritorious clergymen could be better rewarded, than by making use of one of those canonries to induce them to attend to the duties attaching to this public Professorship, and which until lately had never been discharged? In deference to the suggestion of the right rev. Prelate, he should propose that at present the canonry annexed to the Professorship should be a temporary annexation, and that the canonry should ultimately be one in the cathedral church of Bristol. He trusted that their Lordships would accept this Bill in the spirit in which it was offered—namely, a desire to promote the interests of the Church and of learning, of fulfilling a great want and pressing obligation that lay upon the University and the Crown.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the recommendation of his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), that a little longer time should be given for the consideration of this Bill, was so reasonable that he would move that the Committee he postponed for three weeks. He could assure the noble and learned Lord that he made this Motion in no spirit of antagonism to the Bill. The more he considered the measure, however, the less he liked the mode in which this endowment was carried out. There were three parties whose interests were involved—the Cathedral Church, the church generally, and the University. Many changes had been made of late years in capitular endowments, and residence had been very properly made more obligatory upon the canons. In the next place, canonries were no longer treated as sinecures, but as offices tending to develop the efficiency of the cathedral endowment, and making the cathedral the centre of the diocese. What was the case of the cathedral church of Rochester? There were four canonries, one of which was appropriated to the Provost of Oriel. Each canon had three months' residence, and it was clear that the long vacation was the only time of the year when the Provost of Oriel could be in residence. If, however, there were to be two canonries of this kind it was impossible the terms of residence could be complied with. The noble and learned Lord proposed that a canonry of Rochester should be temporarily annexed to the Professorship —[The LORD CHANCELLOR: If it be vacant]—and then afterwards to attach the canonry of Bristol permanently to the professor's chair. But was that a satisfactory mode of dealing with the question? It might be many years before the canonry at Bristol fell vacant; and meanwhile, Parliament was called upon to enact that which was anomalous, inconvenient, objectionable, and contrary to the whole spirit of recent legislation. With regard to the interests of the Church generally he objected to withdraw the few rewards that now remained for zealous and hard-working clergymen, especially as a great many of the canonries were already annexed, so to speak, to offices foreign to the cathedrals, or at all events having no direct connection with them. Then, with respect to the interests of the University itself, there was one point which had not yet been touched upon. By the University Act, passed eight or nine years ago, a great change had been made in the whole character of the lay schools of the University. Up to that time almost the whole of the fellowships were held by clergymen, but a great change had since been made, and half the fellowships were now not only tenable, but were actually held by laymen. By this Bill their Lordships were asked to deprive a moiety of the intellect of the University of their fair share in the rewards they formerly enjoyed. For these reasons he trusted that the Bill would be postponed.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day three Weeks.")—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

EARL GREY said, he greatly regretted that the Lord Chancellor had not acceded to the proposal of his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) to withdraw the Bill for the present year, because the discussion had convinced him that the measure in its present shape ought not to pass. The Amendments to be proposed by the noble and learned Lord in no way touched the main objections to the Bill. He should certainly support the proposal of his noble Friend to defer the Committee on the Bill for three weeks, and would even venture to express his wish that it had been for three months. There was a very good attendance of their Lordships, the subject had been fully discussed, and the House was quite in a position to pronounce a decision.

LORD REDESDALE said, that there was no use in postponing the Bill for three weeks, for at the end of that time the same questions would again arise. He believed that the Amendments of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had been introduced with the best possible motives; but he did not think that they would remove the objections which existed. With the view of giving their Lordships an opportunity of saying whether they wished to proceed with the Bill upon the present occasion, he moved the Previous Question.

Motion objected to, and a Question being stated thereupon, the Previous Question was put, Whether the said Question shall be now put?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if the proposal for an adjournment of three weeks had been accompanied by the assurance that the noble Earl believed that in the course of that three weeks any proposal would be made, or anything would occur, to render this Bill unnecessary, he would most gladly acquiesce in it; but if the real motive—but thinly disguised—were to defeat the measure by a Fabian policy, then he thought that it would be better to raise the direct issue on the Motion for the postponement of the Committee, and take the decision of the House upon it. But to put forward a specious proposal for adjournment, knowing all the time that the real intention was to do nothing in the interval, and that the Motion was a mere hollow pretence, was a proceeding which he trusted their Lordships would not sanction or concur in. There were objections to this Bill, no doubt. There were objections to everything; and all that could be done in this world was to accept whatever embodied the greatest amount of attainable good; and this condition, he submitted, was secured by the present Bill. He repeated that he would rather take the opinion of their Lordships at once whether they would proceed with the Bill or not.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought the noble and learned Lord was scarcely courteous in the way he had received the proposal of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon). He did not gather from his noble Friend's speech that he had any other intention than to give the House, the country, and the University of Oxford further time for considering the Bill, in order to ascertain whether the objections might be removed. But it was not fair to call upon his noble Friend to give a promise, which it might not be in his power to fulfil, that in three weeks' time matters would be in a more satisfactory condition than they were now. He agreed, however, that a postponement for three weeks would be of very little advantage, because he believed that matters would then remain very much as they were now. The proposal he made was that the Bill should be withdrawn for the present Session, to give an opportunity of considering whether any satisfactory arrangement might be come to, and further time for all parties interested to give their attention to this very important question. He confessed that, in his mind, the subject was hardly ripe for treatment by their Lordships, and he thought the Previous Question moved by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees afforded a very convenient method of pronouncing a decision, especially as that Motion, by the rules of the House, took precedence of all Amendments. If carried, it would have the effect of postponing the further progress of the measure indefinitely, at the same time that it would be competent for the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to give fresh notice in case he thought it desirable to do so, and the postponement for the whole of the Session would not necessarily be involved.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S said, he desired to state the grounds of his objection to this Bill. It seemed to him that there was one great principle which ought to govern all their legislation, except in cases where there was an evil so crying or of such magnitude as to be absolutely intolerable—and that was, that they should look more to the future than to the immediate present. If they were for a moment to abstract themselves from present circumstances, and to look to the future alone, there would appear such strong objections to this measure as to render it hardly possible for their Lordships to accept it. The simple ground upon which he felt a repugnance to the measure was that it appeared inevitably to have the effect of damaging the Greek Professorship of Oxford. It was impossible to say that the limitation of the Professorship to a single class would not have the inevitable effect of lowering its value and its dignity. He was quite aware of the importance of those studies which it was the object of the Professorship to cultivate for the interests of the Church; but while he conceded that it was very important indeed that those who were destined for the clerical profession should have the best possible instruction that could be afforded in the University, he did not consider it as all necessary for that purpose that the clergy should be the body which was to furnish the best possible instructor in those studies: on the contrary, he believed that the effect of annexing this Professorship in perpetuity to the clergy would be to prevent the possibility of being always sure that the best instruction would be obtainable. He was not insensible to the other considerations so eloquently urged in behalf of the measure; but his objection was that, if carried, it would have the effect of applying a remedy of a most unsatisfactory kind to an evil merely of a temporary character.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he felt, in common, probably, with a majority of their Lordships, considerable doubt as to the vote which he ought to give. He entertained great reluctance to support any Motion having the immediate effect of rejecting the Bill, lest he should become identified with opinions entirely repugnant to his own feelings. On the other hand, he could not be insensible to the objections raised to the measure. Understanding that there was a sum of money in possession of the College which might possibly be appropriated to the endowment, he thought three weeks by no means an unreasonable delay.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that the revenues of Corpus were not sufficient to endow the Professorship, and consequently that the sum of money referred to was not in existence.

LORD CRANWORTH said, the revenues of the College, although insufficient at the present moment, might hereafter become adequate for the purpose, and some information on the point would be very desirable.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was anxious to guard against the supposition, in voting for the Previous Question, that he was at all desirous of defeating the object of the Bill. He gave the noble and learned Lord credit for the motive with which he had introduced it, but there were so many and such great difficulties in the way that he heartily desired further time for consideration, and he thought the Bill might be fairly postponed till next Session. He always looked forward to the probability of the endowment coming from the University itself.

ARMY—THE ENFIELD RIFLE.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the War Department intend to spend the Money recently voted by Parliament for Small Arms in the continued manufacture of the three-grooved service Enfield Rifle, of which upwards of 100,000 have been made since it was reported by the Ordnance Select Committee, on the 26th November, 1862, as being inferior to the oval-bore Rifle, "1stly, as regards precision when clean; 2ndly, as regards precision when foul; 3rdly, as regards non-tendency to accumulate fouling; and 4thly, as regards simplicity of management;" whether there is any reason to doubt the general correctness of the statement made by the Ordnance Select Committee that the oval-bore Rifle might be adopted into the service "without necessitating any increase to the present cost of supply;" whether it is the case that the oval-bore Rifle has been for many years one of the pattern arms of the service, and is the weapon with which the Engineers of the Regular and Volunteer Forces are now armed; and whether it is the intention of the War Department to institute further competitive trials of large or small-bore, muzzle, or breech-loading Rifles; whether pending the result of such trials, supposing them to be instituted, the manufacture of the three-grooved Enfield Rifle will be continued, and within what period of time it may reasonably be anticipated that a decision will be come to as to the pattern small arm to be adopted into the service for the future use of Her Majesty's Forces?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that it was intended to continue the manufacture of the three-grooved service Enfield Rifle until it had been decided by the Secretary of State what weapon was to be employed in the service for the future. He had said last year, as well as the other day, that immediately after the Report of the Committee on Small Arms had been received it had been decided to reduce the manufacture of the Enfield to the lowest possible limit consistent with the supply rendered necessary from the wear and tear of the weapons now in use. From the 1st of April, 1863, to the 1st of April, 1864, the manufacture of small arms at Enfield numbered only 54,000, and out of that number not above 40,000 were of the three-grooved long Enfield pattern. The production at the present time was only 1,000 per week of all kinds, and of that number under 700 were of the three-grooved long Enfield pattern. He had stated the other evening, and he had nothing to add to that statement now, that it was not intended to give up the production of the present service rifle until the merits of the Whitworth large-bore rifle had been fully tested. With regard to the second portion of the question asked by the noble Lord, he believed the fact was that the machinery at present employed in the manufacture of small arms could with a small expenditure be adapted to the manufacture of the Lancaster Rifle. To this expenditure, however, would have to be added the cost of the royalty. The Lancaster system of rifling had been used for several years in the carbines supplied to the Engineers. It was not the intention of the War Department at the present moment to institute any further competitive trials of small arms. It was, however, by no means impossible that a special trial between the Whitworth and the Lancaster rifles might not have to be made, but he hoped that no long time would elapse before a final decision could be come to upon the subject.

COLONEL KNOX said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adapt the breech-loading system to the Enfield Rifle?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that 2,000 breech-loaders had been ordered for trial in different parts of the world, but no experiment would be tried as to the feasibility of adapting the breech-loading system to the service Enfields until reports had been received as to the value of a breech-loading arm as a military weapon.

FRANCE—FISHERIES CONVENTION.

QUESTION.

MR. DU CANE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Commission appointed last year to inquire into the present state of the Oyster Fisheries of this Country has made any Report; and whether it is the intention of this Government to ask the Government of France to agree to an International Commission, with a view to alter and amend the Fishery Convention between France and this country?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, in reply, that the Commission had not yet made any Report, but he hoped it might make its appearance in the course of the present year. With respect to the intention of the Government, he had to say that communications had passed between the French and English Governments upon this subject, and though at present nothing had been settled, the subject was still under consideration, and he believed it would be better to wait until the Report had appeared before the question was considered, whether any amendment in the Convention was desirable?

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

PRUSSIAN EXACTIONS IN JUTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD LONG said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Minister for Foreign Affairs will continue to preside at the Conference notwithstanding the exactions and oppressions alleged to have been perpetrated in Jutland by the orders of Marshal Wrangel; and whether Her Majesty's Government have protested, and will protest, against the commission of such outrages on non-combatants during the sittings of the Conference?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, these exactions and oppressions which are alleged to have been committed in Jutland constitute a strong additional reason for endeavouring to put an end to the war. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has not, in consequence of those exactions which are alleged to have taken place, ceased to attend the Conference; and I think the House will be of opinion that he would have acted very unwisely if he had done so, instead of endeavouring, in concert with other neutral Powers—and that successfully—to obtain a suspension of arms, one of the conditions of which is, that the Austrian and Prussian armies are not to levy any contributions on the people of Jutland, but are to pay for everything that is furnished to them.

PENSIONS TO COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What decision the Government has come to respecting the granting pensions to Ex-Governors of Colonies?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the Government had not yet come to any decision on the subject. The answers to the Circular letter which had been sent to the Governors of Colonies had not yet been received.

CUSTOMS GAUGERS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When an answer will be given to the Petition of the Gaugers of Her Majesty's Customs, London, praying for redress of grievances?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the Petition of these officers had been received, and had met with the careful consideration of the Treasury. He hoped the answer of the Commissioners would be sent in in the course of two or three days.

IMPURITIES IN THE THAMES.

QUESTION.

MR. CLIFFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the large discharge of gas tar refuse into the River Thames; and whether he will set the law in motion to abate a nuisance so prejudicial to the health of the metropolis?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that the law for preventing the discharge of gas water and other impurities into the Thames, such as it was contained in the Conservancy Act of 1807, had been put in force as far, he believed, as was possible or practicable. The Conservancy Board had been extremely vigilant, and had exerted themselves with vigour and effect. He was informed that the impurities of which his hon. Friend complained did not proceed from premises on the banks of the river, but rather from the creeks and canals to which the powers of the Conservancy Act did not extend. This was a great evil, but there was a Bill then under the consideration of Parliament dealing with this subject, and into that Bill a clause regulating this subject might, he thought, with advantage be introduced.

CHINA.—POLICY OF EUROPEAN POWERS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House, Copy of a Despatch from Sir Frederick Bruce to Earl Russell, respecting the joint policy the Ministers of Russia, France, and America have agreed to pursue in China; and Copy of which he had furnished to Mr. Burlinghame, the American Minister, for communication to the American Government, and to which Mr. Burlinghame refers in his Despatch to Mr. Seward, dated Pekin, 20th June, 1863, and marked A of the enclosures?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he did not think it advisable to lay this despatch on the table. The House was aware that this document related not only to the policy of this country, but to that of the United States, France, and Russia, and he did not think it would be fair to other Powers to produce it.

COLONEL SYKES said, that after the recess he would call the attention of the House to the subject.

INDIA—DELHI PRIZE MONEY.

QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the second instalment of the Delhi Prize Money is likely to be paid in England, it having been paid in India so far back as November last?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied that he was sorry that he could not answer the Question. There had, no doubt, been considerable delay, arising from errors which had occurred in the first list. A despatch for the purpose correcting these errors had been sent out to India nearly two months ago.

THE BANK ACT, 1844.—QUESTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Heygate), he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, taking into account the vast increase of the trade and commerce of England in the last thirty years, he is of opinion that the arrangement of 1844, limiting the Bank of England to an issue of fourteen millions of Bank Notes, without a corresponding amount of gold, is now commensurate with the daily monetary requirements of the country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Question of the hon. Gentleman hardly admitted of an intelligent answer without a general statement on the subject of the currency. He might, however, refer to what he had stated a few days ago, that in his opinion the essential principle of the Bank Act of 1844 had been proved by experiment to be sound and necessary for the regulation of the monetary affairs of the country. But there was a subsidiary and second provision of the Act with regard to which he thought it would be convenient that the attention of hon. Members might be drawn. With respect to the particular points alluded to in the Question, all he could say was, that he was a consenting party to the substance of that paragraph of the Report of the Committee of 1858 with regard to the issue of £14,000,000 of bank notes by the Bank of England on securities. There was a popular impression that the effect of an addition to the issue on securities would add to the practical available circulating medium of the country. That view the Committee declared to be entirely erroneous, and in that opinion of the Committee he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) entirely concurred.

LAMBETH—MEDICAL DIPLOMAS. QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the fact that the Archbishop of Canterbury has the power to confer the title of Doctor of Medicine on persons who have not undergone an examination before the College of Physicians?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Owing, Sir, to the short notice I have had of the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, I have not been able to ascertain all the facts relating to the subject. There is an old statute under which the Archbishop of Canterbury has the power to confer a Doctor's Degree, and I believe that power was recognized by the last Medical Act, but attaching certain qualifications to the person receiving the degree. I am also able to say that the present Archbishop has never exercised the power.

COLONEL FRENCH: It was exercised in 1858.

CONVICTION OF GIPSIES IN CORNWALL.—EXPLANATION.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I answered a Question the other evening which was put to me by the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) relative to the sentence passed upon some gipsies in Cornwall, who were alleged to have been committed for sleeping under a tent. Since then I have written to the committing magistrate, requesting him to furnish me with a report of the case. It turned out as I expected, that they were committed under the Vagrancy Act, and not for merely sleeping under a tent. I have received a letter from the magistrate, which, in justice to him, I desire to read to the House. It is as follows:—

“Lelant Vicarage, May 12.—Having received this morning your letter of the 10th instant, requesting me to furnish you with a full report of the case of the committal of the Gipsies by me, I beg to communicate to you the following particulars:—At Redruth, some few days before the committal, one of them was apprehended by the police for vagrancy, and was discharged on her promising to leave the neighbourhood; instead of doing which she was found the following day at Camborne, only three miles off, telling fortunes. On another day subsequent, a man and woman of the party were found sleeping together under a wagon which did not belong to them, and again cautioned by the police. On the Saturday previous to my committal the whole party were found on the estate of Trelissick, in the parish of St. Erth, where they did a great deal of injury, breaking down trees and lighting fires, when the police again cautioned them, and finding them there again on Monday, apprehended them and brought them to me: They had passed through the western part of the country, between Redruth and St. Erth, begging and telling fortunes. The superintendent of police had given particular directions to the police to watch them, as there had been many thefts committed in that part of the county, and this party of Gipsies had been suspected of being connected with them. When the party were brought before me, I examined them individually and collectively, and found that they had no visible means of subsistence, and could give no satisfactory account of themselves. Under these circumstances, for the safety of the county, I considered it my duty to commit them.”

EDUCATION (INSPECTORS' REPORTS).

EXPLANATION.

MR. LOWE: Sir, I have to solicit for a few moments the indulgence of the House once more to make a short personal Explanation, and I need that indulgence very greatly, because I am quite aware that the case is one of the first impression, and I may appear, though I hope wrongly, to trespass too much on the indulgence of the House in what I am going to say. The fact is in the remembrance of the House that yesterday a document was produced of which I had no notice—a document of which I had no knowledge, a document of which it was impossible for me to give any satisfactory account to the House without searching the records of the Privy Council Office. On that document a statement was founded, that though what I had said to the House on a former occasion was true in intent it was absolutely false in fact. Now, I am not accustomed to have the words "absolutely false" connected with any statement of mine, and though those words were coupled with the statement that my intent was to speak the truth, I cannot regard them with indifference, and therefore throw myself on the indulgence of the House, asking hon. Members to allow me to explain what that document really is, and to give them the result of the searches which I have made about it. According to the technical rules of debate, I know that I ought to have risen at once in my place and have explained. But I was unable to do so then; I can now; and if the House will permit me I will proceed to do so. Sir, there are two kinds of Inspectors' Reports. The one, general Reports—which are made for the purpose of being submitted to Parliament—on the general state of the district in which the Inspector reports. It was with reference to these Reports that the Minute of 1861 was issued, which has been so much discussed; it was with reference to these Reports that the Resolution came to by this House on the 12th of April was passed; it was with reference—and solely with reference to these Reports that the explanation which I offered to the House on the 19th of April was made; and I venture to say it was with reference to these Reports the Committee was moved for last night by Her Majesty's Government. There is a second Report made by the Inspectors which may be called a "special" or "particular" Report. It is the Report of the Inspector on each school he visits, and it is not intended to be laid before Parliament. It is a Departmental matter; it is made by the Inspector to the office; and a summary of that Report is prepared in the office and sent to the school at the same time as the grant is made. When I said on a former occasion that I had given orders in 1862 that no interlineation should take place in the Reports of the Inspectors, I spoke, and I am sure the House understood me to speak, of the Reports which were laid before Parliament. It was to them that the whole discussion was directed; it was only with respect to them it could be said with any plausibility the instructions were contrary to the previous understanding; and I am sure the memory of every

hon. Gentleman will bear me out when I say that those were the only Reports we had in our mind during the whole of these debates. A Report was produced yesterday which had been given to the noble Lord who produced it by Mr. Morell, who had been an Inspector of Schools, and who had been dismissed from his office; and who, as the noble Lord says, naturally reveals the secrets of his prison-house. That Report mainly consists of some not very material remarks on schools, and concludes with these words—

"The discipline is good, and the instruction, though not very forward, is accurate and appropriate as far as it goes, and as advanced as can be expected, considering how recently the present teachers have been in charge."

The noble Lord stated last night that the words "considering how recently the present teachers have been in charge" had been expunged by the Department of the Privy Council, and that circumstance was alleged in direct contradiction of my assertion that, as far as I knew, there had been no expurgation or interlineation in any of the Inspectors' Reports since 1862. I am sure every hon. Gentleman who heard the noble Lord must have understood that the Report then produced and then urged as a distinct proof that my statement was absolutely false—that it was exactly contrary to the truth, and other words equally strong—that the Report then read and produced was one of the kind to which my observations originally pointed. Therefore, I believe it will be with some surprise the House will hear it was not of that nature. It was the Report of a single and particular school—a school Report prepared for the information of the Department, and not, therefore, coming within the Minute—not coming within the order issued in 1862—not coming within the class of Reports which have been under the consideration of the House. Further, it was said that it had been returned to the Inspector to be expurgated. I have inspected to-day, by the kindness of the Lord President, the copy of the Report made by the copying machine in the office, and that copy as well as the testimony of every one in the office who had anything to do with the Report, proves that it was sent to the school without those words being omitted, the omission of which is made use of to give me this flat and absolute contradiction. I thank the House for the kindness with which they have heard me, and I hope

I may be allowed to draw attention for a single instant to a practice which is growing up among us. I do not allude to the practice of officials betraying the trust reposed in them. In all professions however honourable—and there is none more honourable than the permanent official service—there are men of that kind; but what I do allude to and what I do press on the consideration of the House is the practice, the new practice, which is growing up of Members of Parliament suffering themselves to be the instruments for putting off these contraband wares. I have only to say—

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

COLONEL FRENCH: I rise to Order, Sir. As long as a Member of this House confines himself to personal explanation, the House is willing to hear him, though he may not be strictly in order; but when an hon. Member goes beyond that, and attempts to cast a censure on other Members, I trust the House will not give its countenance to such a proceeding.

Lord ROBERT CECIL: I hardly know whether I ought to address the House in answer to a statement so irregularly brought forward. The House has appointed a Committee to examine this Question, and it appears to me that it would be a far more convenient way for the right hon. Gentleman to have waited till he could have appeared before that Committee and made, in his own justification, the statement we have just heard. Part of the statement, as I understand it, consists of a contradiction of the allegation made by Mr. Morell; and I have only to say that Mr. Morell will, no doubt, be summoned before the Committee, when we shall have an opportunity of hearing him, and of judging as to whether, in stating what he does, he is stating what is true or not. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken as to the various kinds of Inspectors' Reports. I confess I have read over his former speech to-day, and my opinion is, that his words, naturally interpreted, seem to refer to all the Reports which the Inspectors make. He now tells us that the Committee of the Privy Council never, since the date to which he has referred, mutilated the general Reports of the Inspectors, but he appears to admit that the practice has prevailed with reference to the special or particular Reports. I regret that I did not draw the distinction, but I doubt whether the Committee of Council will feel very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the distinction which he has drawn between the general and the special Reports.

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

Moved, "That the House at rising do adjourn till Thursday next."

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE AUSTRIAN SQUADRON—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to call attention to the permission given by the Government to the Austrian Squadron to leave these shores, and to take up a position favourable for the further prosecution of hostilities against Denmark, without any practical check or supervision by means of the presence of a British Naval force. It would be in the recollection of the House, that in the beginning of the week a question was asked of the Government with reference to the Austrian Squadron which had passed up the Channel. The right hon. Gentleman, in answering the question, seemed somewhat to avoid the real question. He said that the vessel was not going to the Baltic, but he did not give the slightest intimation that she had gone to the North Sea. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not give the sanction of his example to such an evasive mode of answering questions.

CASE OF MR. HERBERT.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to say a few words on the part of an absent friend. He is a gentleman who is very sensitive on points that affect his character. I allude to Mr. Herbert. He is particularly anxious that no misconception should prevail in this House with regard to what he is supposed to have stated respecting his picture. It had come to his knowledge that an impression prevails in this House that he said something to this effect—that he will not undertake to go on with any more work unless he shall be paid the sum of £5,000. Mr. Herbert is very anxious that it should be distinctly understood that he never said or intended to say anything of the sort. Mr. Herbert is a gentleman who works far more for fame and reputation than for profit, though he feels, and it is felt by his friends, that the work he has done occupied an extent of time that renders it a matter of justice to himself and to his family that some additional remuneration should be given to him.

THE CONFEDERATE SHIP "GEORGIA."
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. T. BARING: I rise to call attention to the circumstances under which the Georgia has been allowed to enter the port of Liverpool and to put a question on the subject. As I bring this matter before the House simply as one of English interest, I shall not refer to the feelings or prospects of either of the contending parties, nor shall I endeavour to provoke an expression of sympathy with either side. I wish to make no charge against any one, and, if I refer at all to the past, it will be merely for the purpose of illustrating the position in which the country is placed as to its international engagements. The question is one of very considerable importance, and deserves, I am persuaded, the serious consideration of the House. An incident has recently occurred which is of a most extraordinary character. A vessel of war carrying, as we are told, the flag and commission of the Confederate Government, has recently entered the port of Liverpool. She is still there, and when the House hears the history of her career, it will be somewhat surprised at the course which has been pursued. This is her history:—The Japan, otherwise the Virginia, commonly known as the Georgia, was built at Dumbarton, on the Clyde. She was equipped by a Liverpool firm. Her crew was shipped by the same Liverpool firm for Shanghai, and sent round to Greenock by steamer. She was entered on the 31st of March, 1863, as for Point de Galle and Hong Kong, with a crew of forty-eight men. She cleared on the 1st of April. She left her anchorage on the morning of the 2nd of April, ostensibly to try her engines, but did not return. She had no armament on leaving Greenock, but a few days after her departure a small steamer called the Allar, freighted with guns, shot, shell, &c., and having on board a partner of the Liverpool firm who had equipped her and shipped her crew, left Newhaven and met the Georgia off the coast of France, near Ushant. The cargo of the Allar was successfully transferred to the Georgia on the 8th or 9th of April; her crew consisted of British subjects. The Allar put into Plymouth on the 11th of April, bringing the Liverpool merchant who had directed the proceedings throughout, and bringing also fifteen seamen who had refused to proceed in the Georgia on learning her real character. The rest of the crew remained. At the time of her departure the Georgia was registered as the property of a Liverpool merchant, a partner of the firm which shipped the crew. She remained the property of this person until the 23rd of June, when the register was cancelled, he notifying the collector of her sale to foreign owners. During this period—namely, from the 1st of April to the 23rd of June, the Georgia being still registered in the name of a Liverpool merchant, and thus his property, was carrying on war against the United States, with whom we were in alliance. It was while still a British vessel that she captured and burnt the Dictator, and captured and released under bond the Griswold, the same vessel which had brought corn to the Lancashire sufferers. The crew of the Georgia was paid through the same Liverpool firm. A copy of an advance-note used is to be found in the diplomatic correspondence. The same firm continued to act in this capacity throughout the cruise of the Georgia. After cruising in the Atlantic and burning and bonding a number of vessels, the Georgia made for Cherbourg, where she arrived on the 28th of October. There was at the time much discontent among the crew. Many deserted, leave of absence was given to others, and their wages were paid all along by the same Liverpool firm. In order to get the Georgia to sea again, the Liverpool firm enlisted, in Liverpool, some twenty seamen, and sent them to Brest. The Georgia left Cherbourg on a second cruise, but having no success she returned to that port, and thence to Liverpool, where her crew have been paid off without any concealment, and the vessel is now laid up. Here, then, is the case of a vessel clandestinely built, fraudulently leaving the port of her construction, taking Englishmen on board as her crew, and waging war against the United States, an ally of ours, without having once entered a port of the Power the commission of which she bears, but being for some time the property of an English subject. She has now returned to Liverpool, and has returned, I am told, with a British crew on board, who, having enlisted in war against an ally of ours, have committed a misdemeanour in the sight of the law. We hear nothing of the steps which, under those circumstances, were taken by the Government, but I feel assured they have done all that lay in their power, and was consistent with their duty under the existing law to prevent the repetition of such an outrage. It is, therefore, not their conduct in the matter, but the impotency and insufficiency of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which our courts of justice find it impossible to interpret, that I wish to bring under the notice of the House. Many of these vessels are afloat committing injury on our ally. The vessels to which I allude, are vessels which would undoubtedly have been arrested if time had been given, and if their purpose had been known. The question is, in fact, can we be said to be carrying out our obligations as a neutral Power towards a belligerent which is an ally, in a manner consistent with International Law, though it may be in harmony with our municipal law, while such a state of things is permitted to exist? For my own part, I have no wish to lose myself in the mazes of a legal discussion on the subject, but common sense, as well as International Law, I believe, prescribe that a neutral should act towards a belligerent who is an ally, as she would like, under corresponding circumstances, to be done by. It was in order to prevent a war between neutrals and belligerents that the Foreign Enlistment Act was passed; and if vessels are allowed to proceed on a course of devastation, if they are admitted into the ports of our dependencies and colonies, and not only that, but to put into ports in this country, is it not, I will ask, time to consider whether we should not do our duty towards others, and whether the existing law affords us the means of protecting the interests of our ally as well as our own? The question as to the extent to which those vessels ought to be admitted to the ports of our colonies and dependencies is, I contend, one of serious importance; but it is, at the same time, one as to which I think there can be no doubt what course the Government should adopt. When a vessel fraudulently leaves our ports, which we know would have been arrested here had her objects been ascertained and her construction certified, and proceeds to carry into effect proceedings of hostility against an ally to the endangering of the peace of this country, it seems to me that it is the duty of the Government to avail themselves in her case of the powers which they possess, and by proclamation to shut our ports against her. If the House will permit me, I will read on the subject a passage from a writer on International Law, who signs himself "Historicus," and who says, speaking of the Alabama—

"First of all, the English Government must decide on the best information at their disposal, whether she was or was not unlawfully equipped in this country in breach of our neutrality. Their decision on this point ought to be final, for they are the sole judges of it, and the Federal authorities may inform their judgment, but cannot question their determination. If the English Government determine that the Alabama was not unlawfully equipped within the realm, she will, of course, enjoy the privileges and immunities of any other lawful belligerent cruiser. If, on the other hand, she is decided to have been unlawfully equipped, then she ought to be forbidden access to any port within the jurisdiction of Great Britain. If she comes within our ports with a prize, her prize should be taken from her, and restored to her original owner, and she herself compelled to depart."

There is another extract from the same writer, to which I wish also to invite the attention of hon. Members. It is as follows:—

"Now, it is a sound and salutary rule of international practice, established by the Americans themselves in 1794, that vessels which have been equipped in violation of the laws of a neutral State shall be excluded from that hospitality which is extended to other belligerent cruisers, on whose origin there is no such taint. Accordingly, the Cabinet of Washington compelled all the French privateers which had been illegally fitted out in America against England to leave the ports of the United States, and orders were issued to the Custom House officers to prevent their return. This course of proceeding appears equally consonant to the principles of law and the dictates of policy. The question then remains—Was the Alabama unlawfully equipped and manned within the jurisdiction of Great Britain? Now, setting aside the vexed question of equipment, I think there can be very little doubt on that of enlistment. The question is one which from its very nature is not and cannot become the subject of judicial determination, because a neutral Government cannot exercise a jurisdiction over such a vessel. It is a matter on which the Executive of the neutral Government must, according to the best information it can obtain, form its own judgment, and that judgment is final and conclusive on all parties. Now, I observe that in a despatch dated March 27, 1863 (Parliamentary Paper, p. 2), Lord Russell writes, 'The British Government has done everything in its power to execute the law; but I admitted that the cases of the Alabama and the Oreto were a scandal, and in some degree a reproach to our law.' Now, with the greatest deference to those persons who may be of an opposite opinion, I submit that vessels of which such a statement can be properly made—and that it was properly made no one acquainted with the circumstances of their outfit and manning can honestly doubt—are not entitled to the hospitality of the country whose laws they have eluded and abused. I think that to deny to the Florida and Alabama access to our ports would be the legitimate and dignified manner of expressing our disapproval of the fraud which has been practised upon our neutrality. If we abstain from taking such a course, I fear we may justly lie under the imputation of having done less to vindicate our good faith than the American Government consented at our instance on former occasions to do."

Again, Earl Russell, in a despatch written in the month of June, said that the British Government had done everything in their power to execute the law, but he confessed that the case of the Alabama was a scandal to our laws. Now, such vessels as the Georgia are vessels which avowedly ought to have been stopped if their purpose had been known. They are vessels whose destination is to roam about, never getting home, and which are tainted with the offence of having violated our neutrality. They are vessels, therefore, which, on every ground, have no claim to the hospitality of the country, and I am bound to say that both our international obligations and a due regard for our own interests ought to have led us to exclude them from our ports. The Georgia has arrived in Liverpool and there discharged her crew, and what guarantees have we that other vessels may not do the same; that our neutrality may not be violated, and that we may not hereafter have to deal with a state of things in which our position will be reversed. While, therefore, I am anxious to express my belief that under the law as it stands we cannot carry our international obligations fully into effect, I am likewise desirous of inviting the attention of the House to the situation in which this country will be if the precedents now established are acted upon in the event of our being involved in war, while other States are neutral. Under the present construction of our municipal law there is no necessity that a belligerent should have a port or even a seashore. Provided she has money, or that money is supplied to her by a neutral, she may fit out vessels, and those vessels need not go to the country to which they are said to belong but may go about the seas dealing destruction to British shipping and property. Take the case, which I hope we shall avoid, of our being at war with Germany. There would, as things now stand, be nothing to prevent the Diet of Frankfort from having a fleet. A number of the small States of Germany might unite together and become a great naval Power. Money is all that is required for the purpose, and Saxony without a seashore might have a First Lord of the Admiralty without any docks, who might have a large fleet at his disposal.

Mr. T. Baring

The only answer we could make under those circumstances to France and the United States, who as neutrals might fit out vessels against us on the pretence that they were German cruisers, was that we would go to war with them; so that by the course of policy which we are pursuing we render ourselves liable to the alternative of having our property completely destroyed, or entering into a contest with every neutral Power in the world. We ought, under these circumstances, to ask ourselves what we have at stake. I will not trouble the House with statistics on the point, but we all know that our commerce is to be found extending itself to every sea, that our vessels float in the waters of every clime, that even with our cruisers afloat it would not be easy to pick up an Alabama, and that the destruction of our property might go on despite all our power and resources. What would be the result? That we must submit to the destruction of our property, or that our shipping interests must withdraw their ships from the ocean. That is a danger, the apprehension of which is not confined to myself, but is shared by many who are far better able to form a judgment than I am. Recollect that your shipping is nearly twice as large as that of the United States. If you follow the principle you are now adopting as regards the United States, you must be prepared to stand the consequences, so strongly was this felt by shipowners that memorials have already been addressed to the Government upon the subject. Last year such a memorial was sent to Earl Russell by the shipowners of Hull, and, if I am not misinformed, a similar one has been sent by the shipowners of Belfast to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for that borough, who has forwarded it to the noble Earl. The memorialists stated that they viewed with the greatest apprehension the permission which has now been given for the violation of our neutrality and the clandestine furnishing of ships to a belligerent; and last night the hon. Member for Liverpool presented a petition, signed by almost all the great shipowners of that place, enforcing the same view and expressing the same anxiety. I am a little surprised at this manifestation, because what is happening around us is a source of great profit to our shipowners; but it is a proof that they are sensible that the future danger will far preponderate over the present benefit and advantages. Merchants and shipowners are generally a quiescent body, attending to their own affairs and leaving the concerns of the country to those in whose abilities, position, and experience they have confidence, and on whom they can rely, on whatever side of the House they may sit, patriotically to unite to avert the evils against which private individuals cannot secure themselves. I think it a matter of regret that no proposal is made by the Government for the modification of the existing law, and I cannot imagine that if such an attempt were made hon. Members on my own side of the House, who may at times be placed in power, would refuse to assist in taking steps to insure this country against the dangers which menace its commerce. We ought, I think, no longer to dally with this question. It is one of immense importance and of a most dangerous character. Neither the Government nor any one else in this House, I am sure, can be deterred from proposing or adopting a necessary measure by the fear that they may be taunted with acting at the dictation of the United States. No one can be more indisposed than I should be to sacrifice the rights, the interests, or the honour of the country to the dictation of a foreign Power, but no one can be more convinced that we ought to blush for ourselves and our country if we are deterred by the fear of some newspaper taunt, some electioneering speech, or some piece of stump oratory, from yielding to the dictation of reason and good sense, and applying a remedy where an evil has been proved to exist. I have heard it said that this is not the time to take such a step, that we ought to wait until the war is over, when we could pass an Act without apprehension that its purport or intention might be mistaken. Has any Foreign Enlistment Act been ever passed in time of peace? Our own Act was passed in 1819, while Spain was at war with her colonies. And let the House remember the act of General Washington, perhaps the boldest act in the life of that illustrious man, when he issued his proclamation to prevent the citizens of the United States from taking part in a war against Great Britain. The whole feeling of that country was on the side of France. "France and Freedom!" was, as a cry, opposed to "Great Britain and Tyranny!" All the recollections of the past war with Great Britain were fresh in the memory of the Americans, and their gratitude to France was still alive. Popular feeling was strongly against General Washington, and yet he perilled his power, his influence, and his popularity, and had the courage to propose and carry a measure for which he was afterwards praised and blessed by his countrymen, because they recognized it as being in accordance with wisdom, with their own interests, and with justice. What is the moral? The moral which I draw from that is that, whatever may be our individual sympathies or our wishes and views as to the causes or results of the pending contest, we need not be afraid of being charged with acting under the dictation of a country which is now engaged in the most exhausting conflict that has ever occurred. We ought not to yield to sympathy when the dictate of duty is clear that we should act to others as we would that they should act to us; we ought not to be prevented from adopting such a measure as may avert the calamity to which I have adverted so imperfectly, but which now looms in the view of every shipowner; we ought not to be deterred from passing such an Act as will protect this country against the charge of being neutral only when it suits her purposes, and violating it when it suits her interests. I cannot help thinking that if there is to be a change of the law this is the moment when those who guide and control our destinies are bound to consider what course shall be pursued. We could do it now without giving rise to any idea that we have been threatened. If we do it now we may save ourselves, while if it is delayed we cannot avoid retribution hereafter. If we miss this opportunity, what we may do at a time of general peace will not be accepted when war occurs. We shall be referred back not to what we have done after the war is over, but to the acts which we have sanctioned by our present policy. I am anxious to ask the Government whether they do not see that what has occurred at Liverpool may lead to our neutrality being called in question, that it perils the performance of our national obligations, and may seriously affect our interests and welfare in the future.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, with many things which have been said by my hon. Friend in the course of his able and temperate speech I entirely agree. No one who has observed the conduct which the Government have endeavoured to pursue with regard to this important and intricate political subject during the past two years can doubt that, whether successfully or otherwise, they have endeavoured to the best of their power to vindicate the laws of this country, and, at the same time, to fulfil the obligations of a sincere and impartial neutrality. I know that these professions will not meet with the assent of those who, in their own minds, have no sympathy with the neutrality itself, who have given themselves, doubtless under the impulse of generous motives, to entire, unqualified, and enthusiastic sympathy with one or the other of the belligerents. Nevertheless, I have such confidence in the justice and right feeling of the country as to believe that the people of England generally will perceive that the Government, in the course which they have pursued in circumstances of no slight difficulty, have really desired to maintain the law and preserve the honour of the country, and at the same time not to deviate from the path of a real and impartial neutrality. Addressing myself first to the last and most generally important of the topics of my hon. Friend's speech, I need hardly say that we are quite sensible of the gravity of the public evil which exists when merchants or any other persons in this country hold themselves at liberty, by all kinds of shifts and evasions, to treat with contempt Her Majesty's proclamation of neutrality; to make themselves parties in a war in which Her Majesty has proposed to be neutral; to shelter themselves under those opportunities of escape which the just regard of the law of our country for persons accused of any offence invariably offers; and to do acts which in their immediate effects place in peril the friendly relations of this and another great nation, and which, in their ultimate consequences, may possibly recoil with disastrous and destructive effect upon the trade and commerce of their own country. The Government had some right to hope that in the circumstances of such a war as this English merchants occupying eminent positions would not spell out the law under the advice of lawyers, saying "I cannot find it in the bond," and availing themselves of every means of escape which ingenuity can suggest hasten to plunge this country into peril, and create a precedent for future mischiefs and dangers, against which the law of this country seeks to provide. I hope the time will soon come—indeed, I think I may infer from the memorial to which my hon. Friend has referred that the time has already come, when the voice of the mercantile community of England will be raised, so that those who may be unwilling to hold themselves bound by Her Majesty's proclamation of neutrality shall see that they cannot expect the moral support of the great body of their fellow-countrymen. I must endeavour to show that the conduct which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government on this subject has been, at least, of that character which the country had a right to expect. The House is aware that there are only three vessels which are alleged, and in those cases I do not say the allegations are well founded, as they have never been brought to the test of judicial proceedings, but there are only three vessels altogether which are alleged to have been fitted out in this country in violation of the law, and with the practical effect of placing this country in the situation of ministering in an important and formidable manner to the warlike requirements of one of the two belligerents. Her Majesty's Government believe that the law was intended to strike, and does strike, at such acts. With regard to those three ships, the House will recollect that the first which left the shores of this country, the Oreto, afterwards the Florida, left before any information upon which the Government could act had been imparted to them. That vessel was afterwards arrested at Nassau, was tried there and acquitted, but it was found that there was reasonable cause for the arrest. So far the Government was not to blame. As to the next ship, the Alabama, I need not repeat what was said upon a former occasion as to the steps which were taken by the Government, after full consideration of the evidence laid before them, with a view to arrest that vessel. It is well known to the House and to the country that orders to that effect were given, but the ship in the meantime made her escape. Then, lastly, there was this vessel, the Georgia, as to which no information whatever reached Her Majesty's Government; no evidence upon which we could act, until she was actually gone. So successfully disguised were the real designs of those connected with that ship that, as my hon. Friend has stated, the crew were actually engaged for a voyage to Shanghai, and all other arrangements for arming her were made with a view to concealment and disguise, and it was only off the coast of France that, meeting another vessel, she received her armament and re-enlisted her crew. The Government, therefore, had no opportunity of interfering so as to stop that vessel. If there be those who think that all those proceedings connected with these ships were perfectly lawful, they will, I am sure, join with me in regretting that, if lawful, they were not also open, avowed, and above-board. It does not seem altogether probable, that if the persons engaged on these proceedings had believed in their lawfulness, they would have taken all possible pains to disguise their real character. Afterwards, as the House is aware, Her Majesty's Government took action in the case of the Alexandra, and since then they have done the same with regard to two other vessels, concerning which I will say nothing, as they will soon be the subject of judicial trial. I may also mention that in Scotland the Government directed the seizure of the vessel Pampero, under the Foreign Enlistment Act, and the result of that proceeding has been that a verdict has been given by consent for the Crown, and that, while great liberality has been shown in waiving the forfeiture to the Crown, security has been taken against the employment of the vessel for any belligerent service, and the authority of the law has been successfully vindicated. I am happy to be able to say that, whatever may have been the difficulties which in these cases the Government have had to encounter in point of law or evidence, the interference of the Government does appear to have been productive of good effect, as it has impeded the progress of the system of fitting out naval armaments for a belligerent State. We have no reason to believe that the efforts of the Government have been unsuccessful in their practical object, nor even so far as regards the elucidation of the law; although it would, perhaps, be premature to express a confident opinion upon a subject concerning which high authorities have differed. But I cannot avoid expressing a sanguine hope that the result of the measures taken by the Government will be to clear up some of the difficulty attaching to the construction of the law, and to lead in future to a better observance of it. I am encouraged in that hope by the fact that in the Court of Exchequer two learned Judges adopted the construction of the Act upon which the Crown had been advised to proceed. Their construction has since received the endorsement of a learned Judge in the Queen's Bench, under circumstances which make it probable that other Judges of that Court may concur in his opinion, and in the case of the Pampero, in Scotland, the Judges of the Court of Session pronounced opinions tending, to a great extent, to confirm the construction of the Act contended for by the Crown.

The result of all this is to leave the Government in a situation in which they have a right to hope that the law, as it is, may in all such cases be capable of being vindicated, and that steps taken to vindicate it will not fail in their object; and therefore the House will probably think that it will not be improper, instead of now suggesting a change of the law, for the Government to act upon that view; but if it should prove to be otherwise, and that the present law is not sufficient, then I trust they may hereafter look for that support and encouragement from this House and the country which upon a subject so important it is essential to obtain. If, in the absence of such support and encouragement, proposals for a change of the law were ineffectually made, it would commit those who ought to have the common interest of the country at heart, to a premature expression of opinion, which might have disastrous effects upon the future of this country. We think, therefore, that if it should ever become necessary to consider the subject, it should be considered at a time when no party feelings nor temporary sympathies may exist to induce the House to take a course which it may be difficult afterwards to retract, and which, if persevered with, might be attended with serious consequences to the welfare of the country. Under these circumstances, the House will, no doubt, consider that Government are doing right in adhering to their original hope that the law as it is may be found sufficient for its purpose, and, at all events, that they ought not to propose any change in the law until they are convinced that there is an absolute necessity for it, and that such proposals will receive the encouragement and support of the House and the country, without which they could not be carried into effect. Having said that, I will address myself to the particular subject of the Motion of my hon. Friend.

I have shown that with regard to the former history of the Georgia, the Government have omitted nothing which they could do under the circumstances. That ship has now returned as a Confederate ship—a public ship of war, with a regular commission as such. I must here notice one observation of my hon. Friend. He says that from the 1st of April, 1863, until the following 23rd of June, this ship—the Georgia—was registered in this country in the name of a British owner, a merchant of Liverpool, and that therefore she was cruising, burning, and destroying vessels at a time when she was a British ship. I must demur altogether to the law of my hon. Friend in that respect. The register is nothing but the evidence of the title of a British owner for a municipal purpose in this country. A ship which has a British register, and which is afterwards transferred to a foreign belligerent Power, cannot, from the mere fact of her still remaining registered in England as the property of a British owner, in any way be justly styled a British ship. Nor can it be said that she has not become what this vessel really is—a public vessel of war. I regret that my hon. Friend should have used an argument that may seem to give countenance to assertions which have repeatedly been made, but which are quite destitute of foundation, that these ships are British pirates. They are not British, and they are not pirates. That expression is untrue in fact, dishonourable to this country; and I trust that all those who have the honour of this country at heart, whatever they may see to condemn in the conduct of persons concerned in fitting out and navigating such vessels as those referred to, will not give encouragement to a proposition so extravagant, and so completely without foundation.

I now come to the point suggested by the Motion of my hon. Friend. He points to the fact that the Georgia is now at Liverpool under circumstances which show that she has never been in any Confederate port. Whether on that account she ought to have been allowed to come in or not I will notice hereafter. The ship, however, came to Liverpool, being at the time a regularly commissioned public ship of war. There is no doubt she was entitled to come in in that character by licence of the Crown, as long as the rules issued by Her Majesty in January, 1862, remain unaltered, because those rules permit ships of war belonging to both belligerents to come into our ports under certain restrictions. They must not remain more than twenty-four hours, except for repairs; they must not receive repairs in the nature of warlike equipment; and there are strict limits as to leaving as soon as the repairs are completed. This ship being a public ship of war of the Confederate States, is permitted to come into our ports, and so comes in lawfully as a ship of war. The Government desired to have information regarding the circumstances under which she had entered our port, and as to the length of time she was likely to remain. They understood she had been brought into dock, it was presumed, for the purpose of repair, and it was afterwards stated that she was likely to be dismantled and sold. If the latter were the case, there would be no harm done to the other belligerent Power by relieving her from all fear of further opposition on the part of the dismantled vessel. On the other hand, if there be no positive pledge that she will not leave as a ship of war, it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to require her to depart as soon as possible.

My hon. Friend has, however, raised a larger and more general question, for he has asked whether the Government think the admission of such ships as he describes that ship to be consistent with their international obligations, their profession of neutrality, and the preservation of British interests. The Government certainly has not considered the limited and qualified admission of ships of this kind into British ports to be at all inconsistent with their duty in any respect. But for the first element in the case to which the hon. Gentleman has called attention—that the vessel was originally manned and equipped from British ports—I think that every one would grant her right to admission into our ports, in the same way, and under the same conditions, as ships of the Federal States are admitted. I must, however, notice that my Friend has imported into the case a consideration which has been frequently dwelt upon in the various publications issued upon this subject—namely, that the ship has never been in any of the ports of the belligerent Power under whose flag she sails. It is argued that this is a circumstance which prevents a ship from acquiring the character of a belligerent ship of war. It has been supposed that there is some rule or other, some settled principle of International Law, which will bear out this conclusion. It should not be our practice to invent new rules of International Law to suit particular cases, and I may state that such a rule as this was never heard of. To say that a country whose ports are blockaded is not at liberty to avail herself of all the resources which may be at her command in other parts of the world, that she cannot buy ships in neutral territory and commission them as ships of war without bringing them to her own country first, is a doctrine which is quite preposterous, and all the arguments founded upon such a doctrine only tend to throw dust into men's eyes and to mislead them. We cannot, therefore, upon those grounds make this ship an exception to our ordinary rules. And now I come to the real question. I have not the least doubt that we have a right, if we thought fit, to exclude from our own ports any particular ship or class of ships, if we consider that they have violated our neutrality; but such power is simply discretionary on the part of the Government, and should be exercised with a due regard to all the circumstances of the case. Does the circumstance of a ship happening to have been fitted out in violation of the neutrality of a neutral nation entitle her, in the first place, to be refused recognition as a public ship of war? Happily, we find an answer to this question in the history of the jurisprudence of the United States; and I do not find that the United States, which have really settled all the doctrines of law applicable to this kind of violation of neutrality by fitting out vessels in their ports for belligerent nations, ever adopted the practice of inquiring into the previous history of public ships of war which laboured under the suspicion or allegation of having been fitted out in their ports in violation of their neutrality. In the case of the Santissima Trinidad, Mr. Justice Story said—

"In general, the commission of a public ship, signed by the proper authorities of the nation to which she belongs, is complete proof of her national character. A bill of sale is not necessary to be produced, nor will the courts of a foreign country inquire into the means by which the title to property has been acquired. It would be to exert the right of examining into the validity of the acts of the foreign Sovereign, and to sit in judgment upon them in cases where he has not conceded the jurisdiction, and where it would be inconsistent with his own supremacy. The commission, therefore, of a public ship, when duly authenticated, so far at least as foreign courts are concerned, imports absolute verity, and the title is not examinable. The property must be taken to be duly acquired, and cannot be controverted. This has been the settled practice between nations, and it is a rule founded in public convenience and policy, and cannot be broken in upon without endangering the peace and repose as well of neutral as of belligerent Sovereigns. The commission in the present case is not expressed in the most unequivocal terms, but its fair purport and interpretation must be deemed to apply to a public ship of the Government. If we add to this the corroborative testimony of our own and the British Consul at Buenos Ayres, as well as that of private citizens, to the notoriety of her claim of a public character, and her admission into our own ports as a public ship, with the immunities and privileges belonging to such a ship, with the express approbation of our own Government, it does not seem too much to assert, whatever may be the private suspicion of a lurking American interest, that she must be judicially held to be a public ship of the country whose commission she bears."

The ship Independencia, to which those words applied, was one by which the United States Foreign Enlistment Act had been violated; and in the case of the Cassius also, under circumstances like those of the Georgia, it was decided that neither the ship, nor her officers, could be made amenable to the jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States, when she came in, after having taken prizes, in the character of a public ship of war. The other belligerent has, indeed, no concern whatever in the course which the neutral Government may think fit to adopt with reference to this vessel; and if the Government refused her admission to the ports of the United Kingdom, it would only be done for the purpose of vindicating our authority. I cannot find, however, that the United States ever followed such a course, with respect to a ship of this character. The Santissima Trinidad and the Cassius were both received into the ports of the United States, were held not to be amenable to their courts of law, and were never ordered by the Government to leave any port. There are, also, a very considerable number of cases reported in which prizes, taken by ships fitted out in breach of the neutrality laws of the United States, and afterwards brought into the ports of the United States, were either restored, or questions raised in courts of law as to their restoration; but I can find no instance of any prohibition or exclusion from any port of that country of any ship, being a public ship of war, which had taken any one of those prizes. We are not, therefore, following the authority of any precedent in the United States, if we exclude this vessel from our ports. The hon. Member for Huntingdon has asked if the Government think the admission of such vessels to British harbours consistent with our international obligations. This question renders it necessary to determine the precise right of the other belligerent in this matter. Now, upon this question, I will quote from another judgment of Mr. Justice Story, in reference to the case of the Amistad de la Russ. In discussing this matter, I hope not to utter a single word in the slightest degree offensive to any one in the United States, and least of all to their Government; but I cannot help wishing that the authority I have mentioned had been more recollected when, over and over again, those extraordinary and extravagant demands were made upon our Government to pay the value of all the ships taken on the high seas by the Alabama and similar vessels. I need hardly remind the House that in 1793, when the United States did give us compensation for certain prizes not restored, that compensation was strictly limited to ships brought into their ports by ships fitted out in violation of their laws, and was not extended to any prizes taken upon the high seas and not brought into their ports. They did not even restore, or make compensation for, prizes which had been brought into their ports by French privateers, fitted out in those ports before the time when they expressly prohibited that practice. All they did was to name a particular date, and to prohibit the French from fitting out more privateers, or bringing in any more of their prizes after that date. Mr. Justice Story thus lays down what is the limit of the obligation which the neutral owes to the belligerent in this matter—

"When called upon by either of the belligerents to act in such cases, all that justice seems to require is, that the neutral nation should fairly execute its own laws, and give no asylum to the property unjustly captured. It is bound, therefore, to restore the property if found within its own ports; but, beyond this, it is not obliged to interfere between the belligerents."

So that he distinctly says, we are to execute our laws fairly, we are to give no asylum to prizes captured by ships fitted out in violation of our neutrality, which are property unjustly captured; but he does not say that an asylum may not be given to public ships of war, whatever their previous history; and he adds that, beyond the limits which he mentions, we are not obliged to interfere between the belligerents. The authority of Mr. Justice Story, therefore, excludes the proposition, that belligerents have any rights entitling them to require interference by the neutral, to the extent of excluding absolutely from her ports ships of this description, if it does not seem to the neutral herself necessary so to do. I say, then, we have done all which that authority requires us to do. And now I will ask what reasons there are for the hesitation of the Government to take the extreme step of absolutely excluding these particular ships from our ports when, at the same time, all the ships of the United States Government are admitted. Some reasons can be given; the House will judge of them; I believe they have had considerable influence upon the determination of the Government upon this question, and I think they are such as are consistent with an honest desire to maintain our neutrality and fulfil our international obligations. In the first place the maintenance of neutrality is plainly consistent with the maintenance of our own rights, and I entirely repudiate the argument which has been sometimes used that you are not to enforce your own laws, because the effect of doing so may possibly be to put one of the parties to greater disadvantage than the other. Neutrality does not require that you should at all consider that. On the other hand, where you have no law to enforce, then it becomes worthy of consideration whether you may not be weighing down the balance in a manner not entirely consistent with neutrality, if you adopt voluntarily a rule which would practically exclude from the asylum you allow in your ports the whole of the navy of one belligerent, and no part of the navy of the other belligerent. That is one consideration. And then there is another. The whole of the hon. Gentleman's argument assumes that the facts, and the law applicable to the facts, are substantiated, that we are in a position as between ourselves and the Confederate States to treat the matter as beyond controversy, and to assume that the Georgia was, in fact, fitted out in violation of our neutrality. Now, we may have very strong reason to suspect this, and may even believe it to be true; but to say that we are to act upon strong suspicion or belief against another State upon certain facts which have never been judicially established, and which it is not easy to bring to the test as between Government and Government—that is a proposition which is not without grave consideration to be accepted. The difficulty of that view is increased by the fact that we have no diplomatic relations with the Confederate States, and cannot communicate with them in the ordinary way. For very good reasons we have not recognized them, and we have not therefore the opportunities of intercourse which recognition gives. What is more, the Government of the United States, by its ships, bars us from the means of communication which would ordinarily exist without recognition. Only the other day Her Majesty's Government were anxious to communicate and remonstrate with the Government of the Confederate States on this very subject, and actually gave a commission to one of our diplomatic servants, a consul, to do so; when it was announced, that the blockading squadron under the orders of the United States Government could not permit even a ship of war of this country to enter into a blockaded port for the purpose of that communication. These circumstances greatly enhance the difficulty of bringing to a practical test the question, whether there has been in this case a violation of our neutrality. Upon that allegation the whole argument depends; and here, again, American authority by no means warrants the notion that you ought to act lightly or without cogent proof. In the case of the Santissima Trinidad, to which I have before referred, Mr. Justice Story says, as to the kind of proof which ought to be insisted on in these cases—

"In a case of the description of that before the Court, where the sovereignty and rights of a foreign belligerent nation are in question, and where the exercise of jurisdiction over captures made under its flag can be justified only by clear proof of the violation of our neutrality, there are still stronger reasons for abstaining from interference, if the testimony is clouded with doubt and suspicion. We adhere to the rule which has been already adopted by this Court, that restitution ought not to be decreed upon the ground of capture in violation of our neutrality, unless the fact be established beyond all reasonable doubts."

There, again, is a principle which the Confederate Government are entitled to have the benefit of, and which makes it matter of serious difficulty to say, that, because we have very strong moral presumptions and very strong reason to believe that a certain ship of war was fitted out in violation of our neutrality, we are, therefore, to act summarily upon that supposition. You have here a mixed question of fact and of law—the facts to be established by evidence, the law to be decided with reference to the facts; and, considering the controversy which has existed as to the bearing and effect of our law, it is not impossible that in some of these cases the Confederate States may have believed that they were acting within that law. All this increases the difficulty; and now I want to suggest some other reasons.

Of course, if we act according to the suggestions made to us in this case, we must act on the same principles, and deal out the same measure to the other belligerent. And if we are to proceed on grounds of moral belief, and do not stop to ask whether they constitute adequate legal grounds of action—if we are to proceed upon information of the kind which carries conviction to the mind—it is impossible, I grieve to say, to acquit the agents of the United States, although we may acquit their Government, of acts which, upon a large scale, are inconsistent with our neutrality. The case of the Federal ship Kearsarge was a case of this character. Beyond all question a considerable amount of recruiting was carried on at Cork for the purposes of that ship, she being employed at the time in our own waters, or very near them, in looking out for her enemy; and she was furnished with a large addition to her crew from Ireland. Upon that being represented to Mr. Adams, he said, as might have been expected, that it was entirely contrary to the wishes of his Government, and he was satisfied that there must be some mistake. The men were afterwards relanded, but there can be no doubt that there had been a violation of our neutrality. Nevertheless, we admitted the Kearsarge afterwards into English waters. We have not excluded her from our ports, and if we had, I think the United States Government would have considered that they had some cause of offence. But it does not rest there. I see from the paper that the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. Fitzgerald) wants information respecting the enlistment of British subjects for the Federal army. Now, from all quarters, reports reach us which we cannot doubt to be substantially true, that agents have been recruiting for the Federal army, with or without the concurrence of the Federal Government, in Ireland, and engaging men under the pretext of employing them on railways and public works in America, but really with the intention of enlisting them, and that many of these men are so enlisted. In Canada and New Brunswick the same practices prevail. Representations have been made to the United States Government respecting particular cases of persons who have been kidnapped into the service and then forced to fight, or treated as deserters, and I feel bound to say that those representations have not met with that prompt and satisfactory attention which we might have expected. How are we to act in this case? Are we to exclude from our ports all the ships of the belligerent whose agents are believed to have been engaged in these practices?—practices which, whatever may be the intention of the United States Government, operate largely to supply their ranks with British subjects in violation of British law. If we are to act in the one case upon suspicion, or upon moral belief going beyond suspicion, it would be difficult to say that we ought not to act so in the other. But in what difficulties we should entangle ourselves were we so to act, not being bound so to act by any international obligation! What may fairly be asked is, that we should do all we can to enforce our own laws within our own jurisdiction: if we do this, we may abstain from doing more, unless, for our own reasons, we find it expedient. That is the course which the Government have taken; that is the course to which they will adhere; and, in view of the difficulties I have mentioned, I think it is a course which is fully justified.

There is one other consideration of importance which I wish to mention; and here again I hope that what I say will not cause offence in the United States, for I state it because it is true, and because it is important that the matter should be understood. The British Government are not assisted by the Government of the United States in matters of this description. The demands which the United States Government make upon us go so far beyond the limits of anything they can be entitled to ask according to any recognized rules and privileges of International Law, that it becomes absolutely necessary that this Government should exercise great caution indeed before they do acts which might possibly be misunderstood, and might give foundation to the idea that they were done under a supposed necessity of complying with demands of this kind. The House well knows that I refer to the extraordinary demands arising out of the case of the Alabama. I have no hesitation in saying that the United States Government by advancing such demands, and by seeking to make our Government responsible for pecuniary compensation for prizes taken by the Alabama upon the high seas and never brought within our ports or in any way whatever under our control, are making demands directly contrary to the principles of International Law laid down by their own jurists; and thereby they render it infinitely more difficult for us at their request to do anything resting on our own discretion, which we are not bound to do in law. What we may fairly say, and what we do say, is this, "We will adhere to the rules laid down by your own authorities. We will execute our own law. We will allow no asylum to prizes or to property unjustly captured. If any such are brought in, any demand for their reclamation shall be investigated. But we will not undertake to recognize claims going beyond these limits. We will not undertake to interfere between belligerents in any other way than that in which we can be shown to be obliged to do so, by the rules of International Law, and the recognized obligations of neutrality."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the strong sympathy which he felt with one of the parties in the American contest might have enabled him to obtain information which otherwise he could not have procured; but he should endeavour to treat the question before the House solely from an English point of view, and in an impartial manner. The instructions issued by the Admiralty with reference to the ships of either of the belligerents which might enter any of our ports were as follows:—

"If any ship of war or privateer of either belligerent shall enter any port, roadstead, or waters belonging to Her Majesty, such vessel shall be required to depart and to put to sea within twenty-four hours after her entrance into such port, roadstead, or waters, except in case of stress of weather, or of her requiring provisions or things necessary for the subsistence of her crew, or repairs, in either of which cases the authorities of the port, or of the nearest port (as the case may be), shall require her to put to sea as soon as possible after the expiration of such period of twenty-four hours, without permitting her to take in supplies beyond what may be necessary for her immediate use; and no such vessel which may have been allowed to remain within British waters for the purpose of repair shall continue in such port, roadstead, or waters for a longer period than twenty-four hours after her necessary repairs shall have been completed."

The hon. and learned Attorney General had referred to the case of the Georgia, but he had hardly explained why she had been permitted to stay at Liverpool in the manner she had remained there. There was scarcely a colourable ground for alleging that the Georgia went into Liverpool for repairs. She came over from the coast of France, where she had been staying thirty days in the port of Bourdeaux for the purpose of undergoing repairs, and she came ostensibly to England for the purpose of paying off her crew. He should like to ask whether a Federal vessel of war would be allowed to pay off its crew in one of our ports with the same amount of accommodation as had been given to the Confederates. It was said that no one would have a right to call this vessel a British pirate; he (Mr. Forster) had never called any of those vessels by that name, but they must remember what the Georgia was. The Georgia was a Confederate vessel which notoriously had been built in England and sailed from Scotland, having on board at the time she sailed a crew solely composed of British subjects, with two exceptions, and of those exceptions one was a man belonging to Sweden and the other to Russia. She received on the coast of France her equipment from England, and was owned by an English merchant for months after she had begun to take prizes. The certificate stated that she was sold to a foreigner on the 23rd of June, 1863; and though the Attorney General seemed to think very little of the matter, he would perhaps correct him (Mr. Forster) if he was wrong in thinking that the fact of being upon the custom-house register as owned by a British merchant gave her the right of application to British consuls in foreign ports until that register was cancelled. Lastly, this ship, having never been into a Confederate port, had come back to Liverpool under the pretence of paying off her crew. The Attorney General had said that it made no difference whether she had been in a Confederate port or not. He (Mr. Forster), however, thought that it did, because it established a precedent which might be used against this country in the future if it happened to be at war. And this brought them to the point. Had the Government done all they could on behalf of English interests, and in consideration of their position hereafter? He hoped the House would seriously apply themselves to that part of the question,—whether the facility that they had given as neutrals to that vessel would not tell against them in the future, if by an unfortunate circumstance they became involved in war? That question might be divided into two parts; first, whether the International Law as between England and Foreign countries could be put upon a better footing; and whether all had been done that could be done under the existing law, so as to merit in the future that neutrals should behave to us as we should wish to be treated?

With regard to the alteration of the law, the Attorney General had given some reasons why it should not be altered; but he did not seem to meet the real point of the question. By that sorrowful war they had an opportunity of putting the International Law of the world upon such a footing as would benefit not only England but civilization in the future. An opportunity presented itself which, he feared, had been lost, but it was for them to see whether it had been lost altogether or not. In the history of international relations, two countries had advocated the rights of neutrals against belligerents—America and France. Now America being a belligerent had asked England to join her in improving the maritime law; and no one would deny that England was in that position that France would have followed her lead in this matter. He might be told that the United States had not honestly and candidly shown a desire to come to such agreement with us; but he thought he could show that she had. On the 19th of December, 1862, Earl Russell wrote to Mr. Adams to the effect, that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government certain Amendments might be introduced in the Foreign Enlistment Act, and that it was willing to receive from the Government of the United States suggestions as to what amendments might with advantage be made in the Foreign Enlistment Act of each country. Mr. Adams did what he could; he sent the suggestions home to his Government; and all that he (Mr. Forster) found further in our blue-book respecting it was a despatch of Earl Russell to Lord Lyons, of 29th February. In that document he said, Mr. Adams intimated that, while the United States Government was ready to listen to any proposition on the subject, they did not see how their law could be improved. It was quite true Mr. Adams had said, the Government of the United States thought their law effective, experience having shown it to be so. He (Mr. Forster) believed it was admitted by the Law Officers of the Crown that the American law was stronger than ours, especially upon the point where ours had failed; but it was proved by papers which had been laid before the American Congress, that the matter had gone a little further than appeared in our own blue-book. The following was a letter of Mr. Adams to Earl Russell, dated September 16, 1863:—

"It will doubtless be remembered that the proposition made by you, which I had the honour of being the medium of conveying to my Government, to agree upon some forms of amendment of the existing statutes of the two countries, in order to make them more effective, was entertained by the latter not from any want of confidence in the ability to enforce the existing statute, but from a desire to co-operate with what then appeared to be the wish of Her Majesty's Ministers. But upon my communicating this reply to your Lordship, and inviting the discussion of the proposition, you then informed me that it had been decided not to proceed any further in this direction, as it was the opinion of the Cabinet, sustained by the authority of the Lord Chancellor, that the law was fully effective in its present state."

Was the Attorney General or the Solicitor General prepared to say, after the experience they had, that "the law was fully effective in its present state?" The following was the reply of Earl Russell to Mr. Adams, which had not been published, and which was dated September 25, 1863:

"I deem it incumbent on me, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, frankly to state to you that Her Majesty's Government will not be induced to propose to Parliament any new laws which they may not, for reasons of their own, think proper to be adopted."

He (Mr. Forster) took it for granted that they were all agreed that no law should be proposed to the House except from an English point of view and on consideration of English interests; but he was surprised that Her Majesty's Government had not considered how terribly such a state of things as the present would react upon the future interests of this country. Reasons of their own should have induced the Government to put this great question of International Law upon a more satisfactory footing. They should have taken the opportunity to obtain from America and France, the great protectors of neutral rights, such an International Law as would make it impossible for this country in future to be subjected to what America was now suffering from them. Let the

House consider what would be their position if they were to experience the same treatment from a foreign country that America had received at their hands. He would not appeal to the case of America herself, because some people might say that whatever principles of International Law we might agree to, America would not abide by them. This he did not believe to be true, and he thought it might be shown to be untrue by past examples. It was impossible, at all events, to charge the Government of America with any unfair conduct in letting their subjects prey upon English commerce. Let them recollect the case of the Mauri. The only other case which had been referred to was that of a vessel which it was said had been fitted out to prey upon British commerce during the war with Russia, but that vessel was not armed for such a purpose, and left America after the fall of Sebastopol. It did not appear that any representation had been made anywhere by the British Government that she was ever used for belligerent purposes, and there were affidavits to prove that she had not been so used. On the other hand, they had this fact, that when some subjects of America did engage in unjustifiable proceedings in connection with the Canadian rebellion, the Government of America brought in a most stringent law to put an end to them. Therefore the assertion that the American Government would not keep any engagement with them in future was not justified by the past. Let them not suppose that the precedent they were then setting as a neutral would not be used against us by every neutral Power in the future whenever we might be at war. Take the case of a possible war with Germany. Nobody would more deeply deprecate such a war as that than himself, or look upon it with greater horror; but to judge from the language of some of the newspapers, and from some speeches, there were persons who looked upon such a war without any particular feeling of horror. Supposing such a war should unfortunately arise, what would be our feelings if, when by our overwhelming naval force we fancied that we had made every German port safe, one vessel should steal out of Marseilles and another out of Brest, and that, meeting on the coast of Italy, one of them, shipping a crew and armament from the other, should be converted into a cruiser to sail off and destroy British merchantmen in the Mediterranean or wherever she could find them? Should we allow France for a moment to do that? Certainly not, if we dared to prevent her; and with our usual pluck we probably should dare, unless the war were a struggle for our very existence—such a death-struggle in fact as the Americans were then engaged in. That precedent, if we allowed it to be established, meant for us a second war whenever we had a war on our hands, unless we were fighting for our existence, and did not dare to undertake another war. "What a wretched navy," it was said, "the Americans must have not to put these two or three cruisers down!" But it was a comparatively easy matter to carry on operations of this kind. All that a ship of that character had to do was to attack vessels which could not resist her, and run away from those which could. There was not the slightest occasion for them ever to fight a battle. If this country were at war, and if temptations were held out to foreign shipowners, there could be no doubt that, considering the large extent of English cargoes, there would, instead of three or four, be more than thirty ships engaged in preying upon their commerce. It would be a very cheap game to carry on. The persons engaged in it, if they were taken, were only prisoners of war; if they were not taken they made their fortunes. Was it to such risks that they would wish to expose British trade? Our merchants at first were disposed to triumph in the fact that the carrying trade of the United States was being transferred to them, but it was clear now that they had found out that present gain would not be balanced by the probable future loss. In a well known letter, addressed by Mr. Edge to Earl Russell, he stated that the effect up to that time had been that 148 American vessels had been taken, and two millions and a half of property destroyed; and that was only a portion of the injury which had been done to American commerce, for the premium of insurance had been raised from 5 to 10 per cent, and the American carrying trade had been transferred to other nations, principally to this country. There could not be a stronger illustration of the damage which had been done to the American trade by these cruisers than the fact that, so completely was the American flag driven from the ocean, the Georgia on her second cruise did not meet a single American vessel in six weeks, though she saw no less than seventy vessels in a very few days.

If we did not take care to settle the International Law before a war began, our merchants would be obliged to transfer their ships to foreign flags. Two other results would follow. First, a number of their sailors would be thrown out of employment, and the sources of their navy would be dried up, because their sailors, after a time, would take service in foreign ships. He thought the Ministry should have considered, that it was no question of sympathy with either North or South. It was no question of submitting to the dictation of a Foreign Power. If they interfered, they would be only manifestly doing what was demanded for the protection of British interests. At the meeting of Parliament the Government should have come forward and said, that if the law was effective, it was most difficult to carry it into operation; and that an opportunity was afforded them which they might never have again, of establishing their position for the future. He sincerely regretted that the Government had not discerned how excellent an opportunity had been afforded for that purpose. The question put by the hon. Gentleman opposite was, whether these particular ships, which had notoriously eluded our neutrality, should be admitted into our ports and receive the same hospitality as the ships of any other belligerent. The Attorney General had turned that into a question, whether the whole navy of the Confederates should be excluded from our ports because one of them had broken our neutrality. The and learned Gentleman asked if they hon. would, because men might have been enlisted in Ireland by the agents of the United States, therefore exclude the Federal ships from British harbours? But the cases were not similar at all. If they found that agents of the United States Government were enlisting men in Ireland, they should express their disapproval of it, and say that such agents should never tread on British ground again. But while they did that they might very fairly say also that vessels which left our ports in breach of our neutrality should not be allowed to return to them. Surely the Attorney General did not mean to contend that in our representations to other nations we were obliged to be armed with the same proof as we should require in the case of one of our own people who had committed an offence against the law. Were there not sufficient grounds for saying, that we ought not to be required to extend to the vessels in question the same degree of hospitality which we would gladly afford to ships which had not broken our neutrality? Then came the point as to what course our interest called upon us to take in the matter; and was it not, he would ask, clearly our interest to prevent the invasion by neutrals of the rights of belligerents, by taking those steps which he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to admit it was in our power to adopt? If, then, it was only a question of discretion, he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Cabinet to consider English interests; and also to consider the enormous advantage they would enjoy in future from now adopting a course based upon the true principles of International Law. He wished to add a word with respect to International Law. He did not profess to be able to define what that law was according to precedents; but even a layman might be permitted to state his views in reference to it as based upon the principles of common sense; and what he understood its great object to be, as operating between belligerents and neutrals, was, that there should be such an arrangement between nations, that an individual in a country should not be allowed by the sovereign power of that country to carry on war with other States without the leave of the Government. There was, he maintained, the greatest possible difference between selling munitions of war to either of the parties in a contest and the sending out armed ships from our ports; for in the one case a neutral country was made the basis of hostilities, whereas in the other it was not. He had no wish to enter into the question, whether the Federals had received from us a larger quantity of the munitions of war than the Confederates, though that was a point more open to doubt than some hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to suppose; though, of course, the Federals had received them more easily than the Confederates from the fact that the Confederates had no navy. That was their weakness, it was true; but in war weakness was a fault, and we might very well say to both belligerents when either complained of our furnishing the other with munitions of war, "It is no fault of ours if you do not stop them, and prevent them from being carried into hostile ports?" When, however, it came to be a question of armed ships leaving our own ports, the matter assumed a different aspect, because the only way in which a belligerent could stop them was not by blockading the ports of another belligerent, but the ports of the neutral Power from which they sailed. Let him, however, suppose that the port of Liverpool was blockaded by the United States navy for the purpose of preventing these vessels from leaving it, could any one imagine that we could remain at peace with America? Such, then, being the position of the case, it was evident that if the Government could succeed in obtaining such concessions as he had indicated, and if neutrals were prevented from allowing their subjects to carry on war, they would not only be promoting our interests, but advancing the interests of civilization. He trusted, therefore, that the discussion raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, with an authority which scarcely any other Member of that House could command, backed as he was by the strongest possible memorial from the shipowners of Liverpool, would impress upon the Government the necessity of not allowing the opinions which had been expressed to pass by without endeavouring to place us in a better position than that in which we seemed to stand in the event of our unfortunately becoming belligerents ourselves.

MR. COBDEN: I will only occupy the attention of the House for a very few minutes. I wish to say a word or two in reference to what has fallen from the Attorney General. Two questions have been brought under our notice by the statement of the hon. Gentleman who introduced this subject. The suggestions which he makes are, that we should alter our Foreign Enlistment Act, and that we should, in the exercise of the powers which it is conceded we possess, prevent vessels of the description referred to from entering our ports. With respect to altering our laws, the Attorney General has entered into a long argument to show that the law as it stands is effective for the purpose of preventing a breach of our neutrality, but I cannot imagine a more cruel joke than the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech must appear when it comes to be read at Washington. What is the fact? You have been carrying on hostilities from these shores against the people of the United States, and have been inflicting an amount of damage on that country greater than would be produced by many ordinary wars. It is estimated that the loss sustained by the capture and burning of American vessels has been about 15,000,000 dols., or nearly £3,000,000 sterling. But that is a small part of the injury which has been inflicted on the American marine. We have rendered the rest of her vast mercantile property for the present valueless. Under the system of free trade, by which the commerce of the world is now so largely carried on, if you raise the rate of insurance on the flag of any maritime Power, you throw the trade into the hands of its competitors, because it is no longer profitable for merchants or manufacturers to employ ships to carry freights when those vessels become liable to war risks. I have here one or two facts which I should like to lay before the hon. and learned Gentleman, in order to show the way in which this has been operating. When he has heard them he will see what a cruel satire it is to say that our laws have been found sufficient to enforce our neutrality. I hold in my hand an account of the foreign trade of New York for the quarter ending June 30, 1860, and also for the quarter ending June 30, 1863, which is the last date up to which a comparison is made. I find that the total amount of the foreign trade of New York for the first mentioned period was 92,000,000 dols., of which 62,000,000 dols. were carried in American bottoms and 30,000,000 dols. in foreign. This state of things rapidly changed as the war continued, for it appears that for the quarter ending June 30, 1863, the total amount of the foreign trade of New York was 88,000,000 dols., of which amount 23,000,000 dols. were carried in American vessels and 65,000,000 dols. in foreign, the change brought about being that while in 1860 two-thirds of the commerce of New York was carried on in American bottoms, in 1863 three-fourths was carried on in foreign bottoms. You see, therefore, what a complete revolution must have taken place in the value of American shipping; and what has been the consequence? That a very large transfer has been made of American shipping to English owners, because the proprietors no longer found it profitable to carry on their business. A document has been laid on the table which gives us some important information on this subject. I refer to an account of the number and tonnage of United States vessels which have been registered in the United Kingdom and in the ports of British North America between the years 1858 and 1863, both inclusive. It shows that the transfer of United States shipping to English capitalists in each of the years comprised in that period was as follows:—

" 1859 ... "	49 ... "	21,308
" 1860 ... "	41 ... "	13,638
" 1861 ... "	126 ... "	71,673
" 1862 ... "	135 ... "	64,578

I am told that this operation is now going on as fast as ever. Now, I hold this to be the most serious aspect of the question of our relations with America. I care very little about what newspapers may write or orators may utter on one side or the other. We may balance off an inflammatory speech from an hon. Member here against a similar speech made in the Congress at Washington. We may pair off a leading article published in New York against one published in London; but little consequence, I suspect, would be attached to either. The two countries, I hope, would discount these incendiary articles or these incendiary harangues at their proper value. But what I do fear in the relations between these two nations of the same race is the heaping up of a gigantic material grievance such as we are now accumulating by the transactions connected with these cruisers; because there is a vast amount of individual suffering, personal wrong, and personal rancour arising out of this matter, and that in a country where popular feeling rules in public affairs. I am not sure that any legislation can meet this question. I candidly confess I do not think that if you were now to pass a law to alter your Foreign Enlistment Act you would materially change the aspect of this matter. You have already done your worst towards the American mercantile marine. What with the high rate of insurance, what with these captures, and what with the rapid transfer of tonnage to British capitalists, you have virtually made valueless that vast property. Why, if you had gone and helped the Confederates by bombarding all the accessible seaport towns of America, a few lives might have been lost which, as it is, have not been sacrificed, but you could hardly have done more injury in the way of destroying property than you have done by these few cruisers. Well, I turn to another point that has been opportunely raised by the hon. Gentleman—I mean as to the practicability of refusing hospitality to these ships. I regard that as a very important question. I alluded to it twelve months ago in this House, and I still think that that is a step which the Government might take with advantage to our future relations with America. But when I hear what the hon. and learned Gentleman says in opposition to that view, I confess I am perplexed beyond measure by his argument. He made a very long and elaborate statement to show that we were not entitled to refuse hospitality to these ships. He admitted, indeed, that we had the right to do it, but he contended against the expediency of our exercising that right. Now, this is a question for the Government, and not for the Legislature; and therefore I wish to impress its importance on the Government. The hon. and learned Gentleman wound up by saying he thought they had better wait until they saw whether the House of Commons was quite prepared to support them in any alteration of our law. I will only say it struck me when I heard that we clearly had not a Washington at the head of affairs, because that certainly was not the way in which Washington earned the tribute of our applause for the course that he took. The Government admit through their legal adviser that they have the power, if they choose to exercise it, to prevent these vessels from entering our harbours, but the hon. and learned Gentleman doubts the expediency of exercising it, and his reason is that he thinks we have not clear proof of guilt. This brings me to a striking piece of inconsistency on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He begins with administering a solemn exhortation, and something like a solemn reproof, to English shipbuilders, for infringing our neutrality laws and disregarding the Queen's proclamation by building these ships. Well, but if they are violating our neutrality and disregarding the Queen's proclamation, it must have been because they built these vessels for a belligerent to be employed against some Power with which we are at peace. The hon. and learned Gentleman assumes that these individuals are guilty of these acts. He knows they have been guilty of these acts; he knows that these three vessels in particular, and the Alabama more especially, have been built for the Confederate Government, and employed solely for that Government, and yet he doubts the expediency of stopping them from entering our ports. He speaks as though we were asking that he should send out ships of war to destroy these vessels without trial. He says there must be legal proof; but it does not require legal proof to warrant you in telling a Government, "You have got these vessels clandestinely; you got them by the infringement of our neutrality code, or, at least, we suspect you, upon fair grounds, of doing so; and, unless you prove that they came legitimately into your hands we must refuse them the hospitality of our ports." Why, how do you act in private life? You hear charges and reports compromising the honour of your acquaintance or friend. You may have a moral conviction in your mind that that individual's honour is compromised, but you may not have legal proof of it, and still you may be quite justified in saying to him, "Until you clear up these charges, which on the face of them criminate you, I must refuse you the hospitality of my house." I hold that you have the right to say the same thing in regard to these cruisers. But what was the course of the Government in the case of the Alabama? They told Mr. Adams, the American Minister, that they should give orders to stop the Alabama either at Queenstown or at Nassau. Therefore, the principle was recognized in the case of that vessel that you had a right to stop her when she reached your jurisdiction. I say, therefore, in the same way, prevent their entering your harbours until they give an account of themselves, to show how they became possessed of that vessel. This has a most important bearing, and one so apparent that it must be plain to the apprehensions of every hon. Gentleman who hears it. If the people of the United States are to be told that not only do individuals here fit out cruisers to destroy their commerce, but that our Government will allow these cruisers themselves to enter our harbours, and there to be equipped—civilly equipped I mean—and victualled, see in what a predicament you place yourselves towards that country, in case you are ever again engaged in war. Recollect her geographical position. She has one sea coast in the Atlantic and another in the Pacific, and her Pacific coast is within about a fortnight's steaming of your China trade. Let any man read the shipping list at Shanghai. It is almost like reading the Liverpool shipping list. Suppose, then, you were at war with any other Power, and you had laid down this doctrine for other countries to imitate. Why, let the American Government be as true and as loyal to its principle of neutrality as it has been, can you doubt, if American nature is human nature, if American nature is English nature, that out of their numerous and almost inaccessible creeks and corners there will not be persons to send forth these fleet steamers to prey on your commerce? Why, many Americans will think it an act of absolute patriotism to do this. They will say, "We have lost our mercantile marine through your doing this, and by doing the same towards you we shall recover it again, and you will be placed in the same position as we were. You will have a high rate of insurance, you will be obliged to sell your ships; you had the profit before, now we shall have it, for the game is one that two can play at." Consider the disadvantage you will experience under those circumstances. We understood the importance of this at the commencement of the Crimean war. In April, 1854, when war was declared with Russia, the British and French Governments sent a joint note to the American Government, in which we asked them, as an act of friendly reciprocity towards us, to give orders that no privateers bearing the Russian flag should be allowed to be fitted out, or victualled, or equipped in American ports. Recollect that the words "equipped" and "victualled" were contained in the request which we addressed to the American Government. And this leads me to make a remark with reference to a most important point—I mean as to the distinction drawn by the hon. and learned Gentleman between a Government ship of war carrying a commission and a privateer. That is a question of the utmost importance to us. We have been in a Fool's Paradise for the last seven years. We have believed that the Conference of Paris achieved a great work in the interest of civilization—that it abolished privateering. Now we find that that was nothing but a stupendous hoax. For what is the Florida? What is the Alabama? What is the Georgia? Why, they are not privateers at all. I remember that the hon. Member for Liverpool who sits opposite—I wish to distinguish him from his Colleague—I remember that he made a speech lately at Liverpool, in which he said that if the Americans had only joined in the declaration of Paris against privateering they would not have been placed in their present predicament; and the hon. Gentleman led his hearers, the shipowners of that port, to believe that if we got into a war we could not be retaliated upon in the same way as the Americans were, because we were under that safeguard which had for ever abolished privateering. Well, let us take the case of the Florida as an example, and look at her history for a moment. She was off the coast of Ireland, and went across to Brest. On her way thither she burnt an American merchant ship, and therefore went into Brest red-handed. At Brest she claimed to be allowed to civilly equip and victual. The Opinion Nationale immediately put forth a leading article, denouncing the Florida as being what the French call a corsaire, and what we term a privateer. Thereupon the commander of the Florida wrote a letter to the Paris newspapers, declaring that M. le Bedacteur was under a great delusion in supposing that his ship was a privateer, and stating that she bore a regular commission of the Confederate Government, and that he and all his officers were regularly commissioned officers; that, in fact, the Florida was a regular ship of war. On the publication of that letter, Mr. Dayton, the American Minister at Paris, took the affair in hand, and in the despatches on our table between Mr. Seward and his representatives abroad we have the whole correspondence that took place between Mr. Dayton and the French Government. Mr. Dayton called the attention of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the circular addressed to the American Government in 1854, at the breaking out of the Crimean war, and told him in effect, "You and England jointly requested us not to allow any privateer to equip or victual in our ports, but here is a vessel that is either a privateer or nothing; she makes no war on armed vessels; she goes about burning and destroying merchant ships, and she does not profess to do anything else, because she is neither armed nor manned in a way to act as a regular ship of war." M. Drouyn de Lhuys and the English Government appear both to have come to the same conclusion that the Florida, as well as the Alabama and the Georgia, is a regular ship of war; but Mr. Dayton, in communicating with his own Government, fairly stigmatized the Declaration of Paris as "mere moonshine," and Mr. Seward in his reply endorsed his language. I mention this to show that it will not save us, in case we are engaged in war, from having reprisals practised upon us that we have joined in the Declaration of Paris, and I am glad that upon this point the hon. Member for Liverpool has not succeeded in misleading his constituents, because they appear to take a very sound and far-seeing view of the question. I am only sorry, indeed, that two years ago, our shipowners did not rise en masse, and compel the Government of this manufacturing and mercantile country to put our laws and regulations in harmony with the present state of our interests and relations; for I hold we are not here to stand up like lawyers and quote pedantically from the Reports of 1810 and 1812. We are living in a progressive age, and in a most progressive country, and let me tell the Government that we have now five times as much at stake as we had at the beginning of the century. Our exports and imports are fivefold what they were at the time when those authorities spoke whom the Attorney General has cited, and I maintain that it is in the power of any country, but especially in the power of great countries, to lay down maxims and establish precedents which themselves become International Law. We have, unhappily, lost a precious opportunity of putting ourselves in a better position for the future, if ever we intend to go to war again. Nor is it merely in time of war that we shall feel the effects of the existing state of things. Do you suppose that foreign Governments do not observe what is going on, and do not fully appreciate our altered circumstances? I might apply that observation to other matters, and ask why we scatter our forces all over the world and then think we are as safe and powerful at home as if we had those forces under our wing. But, confining myself to the question of belligerent rights, I say that foreign Governments will take into account the danger we must incur in case of war, and will find in it a motive for our remaining at peace. Look at what happened last autumn. We held out what was supposed to be a threat, that, in conjunction with France, we should go to war with Russia on the subject of Poland. What did Russia do? She sent her fleet immediately to America, and, knowing the astute longheaded men who rule in St. Petersburg, does anybody doubt what the motive was? The Russian Government reasoned thus:—"If England and France are going to attack us again, we will take care not to have our fleets blockaded in Cronstadt and Sebastopol as they were during the Crimean war, but to be in a position to carry on reprisals, and particularly we will carry on operations against the commerce of England, in the same way as the Confederates are carrying on war against the commerce of the United States." Therefore, they sent their fleet, and, what is still more important, they sent their crews to America, no doubt with the intention of putting those crews into the swiftest vessels that could be obtained both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific side, in order that they might be employed against our commerce. Take the case of Germany. Recently the German newspapers have often pointed to the vulnerability of England, in consequence of the state of the law as established by ourselves in the case of these cruisers. We have, in truth, set a most perilous example, the disadvantageous effects of which, I believe, will be felt in our Foreign Office in negotiations with Brazil or the weakest Power we could have transactions with. Such has been the result of building three or four swift sailing vessels! Are we to be told that England is so much superior to America in mechanics that she can build ships which America cannot? Read the Report laid on the table by Mr. Whitworth when he went to America ten years ago to inquire into its mechanical resources. Nobody who knows the aptitude of the American people for mechanical discoveries will lay claim to any superiority on our part. Do you want an Alabama, a ship that was built neither for war nor for trade—a vessel that can run away from anything or catch anything? America can produce any number of such vessels. When I went first to America, nearly thirty years ago, they were running steamers on their rivers at the rate of eighteen miles an hour, a thing unheard of elsewhere. The Americans have never done much in the way of ocean steamers; their speciality is on their rivers and lakes, where we find the swiftest vessels in the world. But is it supposed that because we have more ships of war, therefore we are sure, in case of war, to find their cruisers? Perhaps nothing is more difficult, not to say impossible, than to find a ship on the ocean after she has once got out of sight. Nelson himself passed many months trying to find a fleet of 500 sail going from France to Egypt. You may find a vessel in a harbour, just as Nelson found the French fleet at the Nile; but even if you should find an American cruiser in a harbour, by your own rules you must allow her to escape, because you say she must have a start of twenty-four hours. It appears to me, on the whole, that the only thing remaining that you can do to conciliate the American people under the cruel losses they have undergone at your hand is to say that henceforth you will deny hospitality to vessels that have been built in your ports, that have clandestinely left your ports, that have been manned and armed from your ports, because you are convinced that to allow such ships to come back here after committing havoc upon a friendly nation would be not only to fail in your duty towards others, but to pursue the course most likely to injure yourselves and endanger your own best interests in the future.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: The present hour and the present state of the House, do not invite discussion, but the speech we have just heard contained a fallacy which I cannot allow to pass without notice. The hon. Member for Rochdale has drawn a powerful picture of the evils to which England will be exposed in any war in which she may be engaged hereafter. I do not think he has exaggerated those evils, for I am afraid that, in the event of war, we must reckon upon seeing our mercantile marine harassed on the ocean by swarms of hostile privateers. But the point which the hon. Member seems to have overlooked, is the impossibility of our avoiding the evils in store for us, by any action we could take now. If by sending the Alabama or the Georgia away we could insure ourselves against the risks which the hon. Member has so eloquently painted, I should at once admit that there was great cogency in his arguments; but I cannot conceive how anybody can imagine that, by refusing hospitality to a Confederate ship, we could add one iota to the safety of our mercantile marine in any future war. You say that you desire to set the Americans a good example. Do you mean seriously to tell me that when hostile passions are aroused, when men are driven by their feelings, or still more by what they consider an overwhelming interest, towards a particular line of conduct, they will care about imitating your example? Do you mean to say that the Americans who, whatever have been their merits or demerits, have never been very particular as to how they contend with other nations, who certainly were not very particular in their dealings with us in Canada—do you mean to say that they will care two straws whether we did or did not, at some previous period, act in a manner which they deemed hostile to themselves? But I will remove the question from this American dispute. Look at what has happened between other nations. Are France and Russia any the less likely to unite now, because they hated each other bitterly in 1853 and 1854? Are England and Denmark who hated each other bitterly during the great war, on that account less sympathetic or friendly now? Nations in selecting their policy, are not affected by events which may have taken place five, ten, or fifteen years before. Gratitude or indignation may last in the breasts of individuals for so long a period, though even that is a rare phenomenon; but I am quite sure that you can find in the history of the world no instance in which those feelings have endured so long in the breasts of nations. To go from example to precedent. We have heard a great deal about precedent from both the hon. Member for Bradford and the hon. Member for Rochdale. They say that we ought to set up a precedent which shall change International Law. I confess that sounds to me very strange language. We heard from the Attorney General, stated with the greatest eloquence and clearness, what International Law is. You say to us, "Don't keep to that, don't keep International Law as it is, but by the process of breaking it, make it something else, and your reward for so breaking it shall be that other nations, instead of breaking it, will keep it, and keep it in the way which will be advantageous to you in future wars." I confess that that is a process which I do not think that other nations are very likely to go through. At all events, if they follow our example in nothing else, they will follow our example in the convenient plan of amending International Law by the process of breaking it. But there is something more to be said. You profess neutrality, and I presume that you intend that neutrality to be honest. I presume that even the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), strongly as he feels upon the subject, will not recommend us to depart from strict neutrality. But can there be a greater breach of neutrality than that you should break International Law on the one side and not on the other—that you should alter International Law by so breaking it, and that entirely in favour of one belligerent? And what adds to the peculiar baseness of such a proceeding is, that you are asked to take this course, not because you believe that one side is right and the other wrong, but solely that it may give you an advantage in some future war. I confess that such a mode of dealing with International Law appears to me more dishonest and more immoral than anything I ever before heard proposed in this House. The hon. Member for Rochdale told us a great deal about the bitter feelings of the inhabitants of the Federal States at the losses they have endured. He counted up those losses, and asked us to believe, as we well could, that a race come of the same stock as ourselves would be operated upon more strongly by the bitterness of feeling occasioned by these losses than by any other motive. I thoroughly believe it. I dare say that for many years those nations will feel bitterness towards the nation through whose instrumentality they believe that they have been inflicted. But have there been losses only on one side? Has there been suffering only on one side? And has British aid been given only to one side? I have in my hand a paper which tells a different story, and to the tale which it tells I invite the attention of the House. In the course of the year 1862 there were exported to the Federal States rifles and muskets of the value of £546,000, besides 11,947,000, or in round numbers 12,000,000, percussion caps. What the Americans have done with all those caps I cannot imagine. I believe that, according to the most recent authority, they have killed 200,000 Confederates. That allows sixty shots for each man killed, which undoubtedly is not very good practice. [Lord ROBERT MONTAGU: Yes, it is.] My noble Friend says that it is. I trust that in any war in which we may be engaged he will wield his weapon with more effect. I cannot pass over the fact which has been stated in this House, and is well known, that the mercantile house which has been mainly instrumental in conveying this enormous assistance to the Federals, and effecting this fearful injury upon the Confederates, is the house of Baring and Co. Now, I want you to consider the feelings with which the Confederates regard these enormous reinforcements, which have been conveyed by the English people through the hands of Messrs. Baring and Co., in violation of Her Majesty's proclamation of neutrality. [Mr. COBDEN: Not in violation of the law.] The Attorney General is not here to inform us as to the law, and I will adhere to my statement until it is contradicted by some more competent authority. Whether contrary to law or not, it is an enormous assistance conveyed through the house of Messrs. Baring and Co. by the English people to the Federals. You have been considering the feelings of the Federals. Do you suppose the Confederates have no feelings? Do you suppose they do not feel for their rich country desolated, for the enormous injury which has been inflicted upon their industry, for their towns bombarded, for their population slaughtered, and for the fearful trials to which every class of their people have been exposed; and do you suppose that when they learn that all this havoc has been committed through the instrumentality of munitions of war conveyed by English merchants, the bitterness on one side will not be as great as that on the other? If our neutrality is honest, we must regard the bitterness on one side as much as that of the other. I am sure that, considering what in the future are likely to be the opportunities of greatness offered to the two divisions into which the American republic is fast dividing, that we shall have as much cause for regret if we permanently alienate from England the inhabitants of that vast country which lies to the south of the Potomac as we shall have if we alienate those who inhabit the smaller country which lies to the north of that river. We cannot give too much praise to the very learned and moderate speech of the Attorney General. It seemed to me to give an exhaustive and complete statement of the law, comprehensible by the least instructed intellect; and I hope that it will be accepted as an official reply to many fallacies upon this subject which have been current in this country. I will only express my regret that after that speech the hon. Member for Rochdale should have repeated the statement that it was proved that the Georgia came out in violation of our neutrality. Why, you have not even got a verdict. It will be time enough to talk about the law being broken when you have got any court of law to pronounce in your favour. The only court which pronounces in your favour is that which sits in your own brains. There is not a ghost of a justification for saying that the Georgia has broken our Foreign Enlistment Act. All the facts are against you. It is probably well known to the hon. Member for Rochdale, that it is quite as much within the International Law to sell ships of war to another nation as it is to sell any munitions of war. There seems, therefore, to be no ground for the statement that the Georgia has invaded our ports in defiance of our neutrality, and we should ourselves be guilty of a clear breach of neutrality if we shaped our policy on an assumption which cannot be proved either in law or in fact.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the noble Lord, in admitting the novelty in war of such cases as the Georgia and the Alabama, had conceded the very basis of the argument of the hon. Member for Huntingdon. It was to prevent such cases becoming a recognized usage of war for the future that he ventured to urge upon the House and the Government the importance of all that we now could do to remedy the evil effects of them, and to prevent their recurrence. He had listened with great regret to the speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General, and especially to his statement that he was not prepared to recommend Her Majesty's Government to take either of the courses suggested by the hon. Member for Huntingdon. Probably, if the hon. and learned Gentleman had paid more attention to the history of America and less to their law cases, he would have come to a different conclusion. When in 1793 we remonstrated with the American Government against the fitting out of privateers in their ports, they did not say that they had no municipal law to meet the case, and were not bound by International Law, but at once passed an Act to meet our complaints. The Act of 1794 was for a time sufficient for its purpose. He could not find that it was evaded by a single privateer issuing from the ports of America to prey upon British commerce during the long course of the French war. Shortly after the close of that war, however, the Spanish and Portuguese colonies in South America revolted from their parent countries. Great sympathy was felt in the United States for the independence of these colonies, and their lawyers were not long in discovering a flaw in the Foreign Enlistment Act, just as lawyers had done in ours, which was almost identical. In evasion of the law, privateers were despatched from American ports. The course adopted was much the same as that taken by those who, in our own day, fitted out the Alabama, Georgia, and Florida. The vessels were chartered as traders, and received guns and ammunition under the disguise of cargoes of merchandise. When they got out to sea they hoisted their guns out of their holds, mounted them on deck, and displayed the flag of one of the South American Republics. The American Government, he was bound to say, did all they could to enforce the law against these cruisers. There were numerous cases in which they were seized and condemned, and there were also cases of prosecution for infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act. Those measures, however, were not sufficient to repress the evil. Spain and Portugal both remonstrated with the United States for allowing cruisers to be fitted out in their ports; and the complaints which were made bore a striking resemblance to some of those which the Federal Government had lately addressed to us. The Portuguese Government pointed out that the fault was entirely in the insufficient state of the existing law, and urged its amendment. Similar representations were made by the Spanish Minister; and even this country and France joined in the remonstrances. What was the reply of the United States? They did not say that they had a municipal law, and that no international obligation required them to go beyond it. On the contrary, the President immediately sent a message to Congress, in which, after pointing out the evasions of their law, he said—

"It is of the highest importance to our national character, and indispensable to the morality of our citizens, that all violations of our neutrality should be prevented. No door should be left open for the evasion of our laws; no opportunity afforded to any who may be disposed to take advantage of it to compromise the interest and the honour of the nation. It is submitted, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, whether it may not be advisable to revise the laws with a view to this desirable result."

He thought this message was most honourable to American statesmanship, and he should like to see Her Majesty's Government in the present juncture adopt the same policy as the Government of the United States in 1817. In accordance with the President's Message an Act of Congress was proposed, containing two clauses not in the original Act, and, he might observe, wanting to our statute, the one giving collectors of Customs authority to detain vessels under suspicion of being intended for hostilities till inquiry should be made, the other giving the State officers power to exact bonds from vessels suspected, that they would not be used hostilely against an ally of the States. There was then, it should be remembered, quite as strong a sympathy in the United States for the South American colonies as prevailed among hon. Gentlemen opposite for the Southern States of North America; and, of course, there was strong opposition to the proposed Act during its progress through Congress. It was said that it had been brought forward under pressure from foreign Powers, and that traders had a right to sell ships if they chose. The Government replied that they had duties to perform, not to one nation, but to all; that they had listened to the representations of foreign Powers only because they deemed them reasonable, and that traders must take care that in their mercantile dealings they did not do anything which was incompatible with the higher interests of the country. He did not hesitate to say that such cases as had occurred in this country could not have taken place under the law of the United States; and he held that our honour and our interest required that we should adopt the clauses which had been added to the original American Act. In so doing, we should, he thought, prevent the repetition of such unfortunate cases for the future. As regards those cases which had already occurred, he thought the least we could do was to prohibit absolutely such vessels from entrance to our ports. We had precedent for such course in the conduct of the American Government, in 1793, who, not content with passing their Foreign Enlistment Act at our instance, had also dismissed from their ports those vessels which had previously been fitted out in them. But there was yet an earlier precedent, arising out of the American war of Independence. Gibbon, in his well known memoir in justification of the war with France in 1779, told us that when privateers were fitted out in French ports for the service of the American Government, the British Government strongly protested against it, and offered France the alternative of checking the practice or going to war. France chose peace, and undertook to dismiss all the privateers from her ports at once. Therefore, there were two precedents directly in point, showing what ought to be done in regard to these vessels. It was said that there had been no judicial investigation in connection with the Southern cruisers, but that was because they escaped from this country before any trial could be instituted. He did not suppose that any one could doubt that these vessels were built in violation of our neutrality, and he hoped the Government would entertain the proposals suggested by the hon. Member for Huntingdon.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, there could be no doubt either as to the bias of the hon. Member's sympathies or the source of his inspiration. Instead of availing himself of the authentic sources of information in this country he had evidently gone for facts to the American papers laid on the table of Congress, and for arguments to the debates in their chambers. The hon. Member for Rochdale had proved conclusively that the trade of the Northern States had been considerably diminished; but he had failed to show how we had been the cause of the destruction of their commerce. His speech was like a bridge without a keystone. His facts and premises were established, but his conclusion was illogical. The hon. Gentleman had entirely omitted to show how we were responsible for the injury which American commerce had sustained since the war began. "Yes, I did," he says; "you admitted the vessels of the Southern States into your ports, and these damaged the commerce of the Northern's." He (Lord Robert Montagu) had thought that the Southern States were not yet ripe for recognition. But the hon. Member had shown that they not only had held their ground against the North, but had actually destroyed their commerce; and that, too, in the face of a navy which had come victorious out of many a battle, and prided itself upon being the strongest in the world. Not only had the Southern States manufactured a navy, but they had beaten the Federal ships which had long ridden the sea in triumph, so that the latter were now fain to avoid the conflict. How were we to blame for that? Should we have done anything to prevent the South from sending their ships to sea, or have refused to them that hospitality which our neutrality bound us to concede equally to both sides? The hon. Member had also drawn a case which he had said was analogous, of a friend who was suspected of an act derogatory to his honour, although nothing had actually been proved against him, and had said that in such a case we should refuse to have any more dealings with our friend until he had succeeded in clearing his character. So, he said, we should act by the Southern States who were suspected of fitting out ships in this country. But the Attorney General had pointed out that as yet the Southern States were not recognized by us, and that, consequently, we had no legal channel for those communications which might otherwise have been addressed to them. The Federal Government had themselves prevented us from communicating with the South by blockading their ports, and had declined to permit a British man-of-war to proceed to one of the Southern ports for that purpose. The hon. Member said the Florida was a privateer, and had grounded his assertion upon the fact that she had not fought men-of-war, but preyed upon the trade of her enemy. This was a very mistaken definition of a privateer. A privateer was an armed merchant vessel, which, whenever opportunity offered, plundered enemy's property; but the Florida carried no cargo, and had actually proved her commission as a man-of-war. Neither did he think, as the hon. Member seemed to believe, that if England altered her law, Russia would refrain from sending privateers to sea to plunder English property in case of war with this country. For these reasons he could not concur with the otherwise eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Rochdale. He (Lord Robert Montagu) did not attribute the decline of trade, and the rise in freightage in America to any illegal action or violation of neutrality on our part; it was the inevitable result of a war which diverted the energy of the capital in other directions, and absorbed a great deal of the capital which would otherwise be employed in promoting commerce.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he believed the country would endorse the definition of the law of neutrality as laid down by the Attorney General, and carried out by the Administration. He denied that the opinions of the hon. Members for Rochdale and Bradford were shared by the people at large. The hon. Member for Rochdale had given the House a list of the losses which had occurred to the United States navy, but he had not alluded to the other losses of that country—its loss of liberty, of credit, of everything which a country should hold dear. The South had, no doubt, the blot of slavery to contend against; but had the North had nothing to do with that? He contended that all the evils of the slave trade were owing to the mode in which the Federal States had formerly dealt with it. The whole system of Government in the Northern States was false, rotten, and corrupt, while the South was making for themselves a great name and a glorious history. He believed the day was not distant when the Confederacy would be an independent nation recognized by the nations of Europe.

SUPPLY—THE MALT DUTY.

RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. MORRITT said, he had it at last in his power to bring before the House the Motion which had stood for such a length of time upon the paper. The delay had not by any means been owing to him—quite the contrary. What had caused the delay it was needless to inquire, but as far as he was concerned he thought he was only placed in a better position, and he did not regret what had occurred. There was one thing, however, which he did regret, and that was the extremely empty state of the House—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at Nine o'clock, till Thursday next.

MR. HERBERT, R.A.—PERSONAL
EXPLANATION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would request permission to be allowed to make a personal explanation respecting something which fell from him on Friday before the adjournment of the House for the recess, and which had, he believed, caused some annoyance to his hon. Friend (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck). His hon. Friend was hurt, first, at a statement which, as he thought, implied that he had spoken of Mr. Herbert's charge for the fresco in the House of Lords without that gentleman's authority; and secondly, because he had received no notice as to this statement. The facts were these:—In coming down to the House early on Friday morning to attend a Committee, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) met Mr. Herbert, who seemed much distressed at the newspaper report of what his (Sir Stafford Northcote's) hon. Friend had stated, and said he was most anxious it should be understood that he had uttered nothing that could be considered disrespectful either to the House or the Government. Mr. Herbert asked his advice, and he recommended him to communicate with his hon. Friend, who might then make a statement to the House; and he added, that if Mr. Herbert could not find his hon. Friend, he would then himself make such a statement. On coming into the House that evening, he did not find his hon. Friend present, and he, therefore, said what he did. He had apologized to his hon. Friend for not having given him notice, but he had fully understood that Mr. Herbert would do so. He had since heard that Mr. Herbert did see his hon. Friend, and it was arranged between them that nothing should be said on the subject; but as Mr. Herbert did not let him (Sir Stafford Northcote) know this, he had heard nothing about the matter. He had had a full account of the conversation which had taken place between his hon. Friend and Mr. Herbert, and though he would not trouble the House with the details of the conversation, he might say, and

Mr. Herbert himself admitted, that the inference drawn by his hon. Friend from what passed was not an unnatural one, and that his hon. Friend might consider he was fairly justified in stating what he did. Mr. Herbert, however, positively maintained that nothing was further from his thought than to appear to dictate terms to the Government or the House. All he meant to say was, that it would be impossible for him to continue his work in the House, unless he received such a remuneration as would justify him in doing so.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, it was unnecessary for him after the explanation just made to assert that he had, as he thought, sufficient authority for the statement which he had addressed to the House on Thursday, and that he had not absented himself on the Friday from any wish to evade responsibility. Not only did he feel a great admiration for Mr. Herbert as an artist, but he entertained a sincere regard for him as a friend, and he would not, therefore, have said anything which he thought likely to distress him or prejudice his interest. At the same time, after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he considered it his duty to express his view as strongly as he could that Mr. Herbert was entitled to £5,000, not as a matter of justice, but of right.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—PRUSSIAN EXACTIONS IN JUTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITESIDE: I wish, Sir, to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he or the Government have received information that contributions or exactions have been demanded by the Prussian Army from the people of Denmark; and whether it is in accordance with the terms settled at the Conference that, during the armistice, the Prussian Army should be at liberty to levy these exactions?

MR. LAYARD: Sir, as was stated the other evening, undoubtedly the understanding of the Conference was, that after the suspension of arms which was agreed upon no more forced contributions should be raised in Jutland, and, on the contrary, that all provisions should be paid for. I see by statements in the newspapers that forced contributions have been raised, but the Government have received no information on the subject.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.
THE AUSTRIAN SQUADRON.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I see, Sir, in the newspapers a statement that an Austrian squadron has proceeded to the Baltic. Has the Government any information on this subject?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I have not seen the statement, or even heard of it.

MR. LAYARD: Part of the Austrian squadron remained behind at Liabon, and I presume it has gone to rejoin the other vessels, not, however, in the Baltic, but in the North Sea.

RUSSIA — EMIGRATION OF THE CIRCASSIANS.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask, Whether the Government have received from their Agents abroad any information touching the conduct of the Russian Government in Circassia; and, if so, whether they will lay the Papers upon the table?

MR. LAYARD: Sir, the Government have received despatches both from Constantinople and from our Consuls on the shores of the Black Sea, stating that a large emigration has taken place from Circassia. [MR. HENNESSY: A forced emigration.] It is so far forced that these Circassians, having been subdued by the Russian army, consider it impossible to live under the dominion of Russia, and have taken refuge in Turkey. I may add that the utmost efforts are being made there to provide for these poor people, and the Sultan has subscribed a large sum towards furnishing them with provisions and shelter. At the same time, I believe a great mortality has taken place among them. I will look at the despatches which we have received on this subject, and, if possible, will produce them.

SUPPLY.

Resolutions [May 12] reported.

MR. DYCE, R.A.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, with reference to the contract entered into between the Government and Mr. Dyce, asked, Whether the whole of the sum agreed upon had been paid, and what proportion of the paintings had been executed? In the event of the agreement not having been completed according to contract, he thought, under the circumstances, it would not be right to exact the return of the money from Mr. Dyce's representatives.

MR. COWPER said, Mr. Dyce had received the whole sum agreed upon in advance, and had completed six panels, two remaining unfinished. He thought it was well understood that the price which was fixed so many years ago was very inadequate to the amount of labour and skill that Mr. Dyce bestowed upon his work. No decision had been come to with respect to the work which remained to be executed. [MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: With regard to the money?] No decision had been come to upon the subject; but the fullest consideration would be given to it, and he appreciated the feelings of the hon. Gentleman in wishing that nothing illiberal should be done by the Government.

AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 83.]
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Notice of Appeal to be given to the Assessment Committee).

MR. DODSON called attention to the fact that, if this clause passed in its present shape it would make the Bill inconsistent with the principal Act passed in 1862, which provided that in case the valuation list was appealed against, the Board of Guardians should be the parties to defend it; whereas this clause proposed that the assessment committees should defend the rate appearing on that list against which an appeal should be made. The inference, therefore, would be that the assessment committee was a body having a corporate existence; whereas, in reality, it was only a portion of the Board of Guardians dealing with the funds of the Board. He proposed, therefore, to omit from the clause the words "assessment committee," in order to insert "Boards of Guardians."

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he preferred the words which it was proposed to strike out.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE moved, at the end of the clause, to add,

"Provided always, That no ratepayer shall have a right of appeal under the existing law to the special sessions or quarter sessions unless his objections to the valuation list shall have been made before the meeting or meetings of the assessment committee appointed under the Act to hear such objections."

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he had no objection to the principle of the addition proposed by the right hon. Baronet; but he would prepare a clause which would carry out his object in a manner more consonant with the other portions of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Provision for Costs of Committee on Appeals).

MR. DODSON moved to leave out "committee," and insert "Board of Guardians." The object of his Amendment was to make what he understood to be the object of the clause more clear—namely, that the costs of respondents in appeals should be paid out of the common fund of the union.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS agreed to the Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 7 agreed to.

MR. JOHN PEEL moved to insert new clause after Clause 5 (Provision for new maps, plans, and books of reference).

MR. NEWDEGATE supported the clause.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he would agree to the clause if the words "or without" the valuation were omitted.

MR. JOHN PEEL objected to the omission of the words, because he wanted to have the maps without a new survey or valuation. Why should they go to the expense of a new survey and valuation without any necessity for incurring it?

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carefully consider the clause and the expense which it would throw upon the parishes.

LORD HARRY VANE concurred with the right hon. Baronet in thinking that the right hon. Gentleman ought not readily to assent to the clause.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that if the House would insist upon a map and a valuation, great expense must be incurred. But if a map were permitted, the guardians themselves would make the valuation, and no correct valuation could be made until a map was provided.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Peel) would withdraw the clause, he would himself bring up another one on the bringing up of the Report.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WENTWORTH BEAUMONT, for Mr. H. Fenwick, who had given notice of new clauses (Abolishing deductions from rental in ascertaining value), (Deduction where rate of an exhaustible nature), (Provision in cases of small tenements rated instead of occupiers), (Rates may be amended in certain cases), moved the first of these clauses.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS opposed the clause, but promised that he would consider the subjects referred to in the other Amendments before next Session.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was rejoiced that the right hon. Gentleman was about to consider the gross injustice of assessing the royalty of mines as income.

MR. LIDDELL was anxious to know whether the right hon. Gentleman approved the principle of the second clause of which notice had been given by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Fenwick)—that wherever the rateable hereditaments were of an exhaustible nature a deduction should be made from the rateable value sufficient to reproduce the capital value of the exhaustible portion at the termination of the estimated period of exhaustion.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that he had not pledged himself to that principle, but the whole subject of deduction and exemption should receive his attentive consideration, with a view to legislation next Session.

MR. WENTWORTH BEAUMONT said, he would withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HOWES called attention to a doubt which had lately arisen, whether magistrates individually interested as ratepayers were entitled to sit and hear appeals.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, it was not very clear how existing Acts affected magistrates in the case referred to. He had, therefore, determined to frame a clause removing all doubt on the subject.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

HIGHWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SIR GEORGE GREY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Act for the better management of highways in England. The present Bill was intended to amend in some respects the Bill passed a short time since, which, on the whole, had operated most satisfactorily. A Return lately presented to the House showed that the Act had been brought into operation in thirty-three or thirty-four counties, and in the great majority of cases throughout the entire extent of those counties, though in some it had only been adopted in part. But, although the Bill generally worked well, numerous suggestions of a practical character had been received from persons concerned in working the Act, and the present Bill was intended to give effect to the more important of those suggestions, avoiding any which were likely to excite prolonged discussion. There were certain cases in which the Act at present was not applicable to the formation of highway districts, and others in which the mode of defraying the expenses of highway boards required amendment. In many instances, also, the highway and Poor Law districts were not conterminous, and matters relating to the audit were capable of improvement. The Bill would also confer powers for appointing additional surveyors. It was now in print, and would be delivered immediately to hon. Members. He proposed to fix an early day for the second reading, after which, in accordance with the wishes of hon. Gentlemen, he should move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Act for the better management of Highways in England, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE GREY and Mr. BARING.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 113.]

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, May 20, 1864.

MINUTES.] — NEW WRIT ISSUED — For Gloucester City v. J. J. Powell, esquire, Recorder of Wolverhampton.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

NAVY—THE GUNS OF THE "ROYAL SOVEREIGN."—QUESTION.

COLONEL C. P. LESLIE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Royal Sovereign, cupola ship, is to be armed with smooth-bore guns; and, if so, what reason there is, after the decided superiority of rifle guns has been recognized, that a smooth-bore armament should have been decided upon?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, the Royal Sovereign was at present armed with five twelve-ton 150-pounder guns of the smooth-bore, but as soon as the best system of rifling was decided upon she would be armed with 300-pounder rifled-bore guns. At present that system had not been finally decided upon, and until that time the guns in use would be exclusively of smooth-bore.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—PRUSSIAN EXACTIONS IN JUTLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, seeing the noble Viscount in his place, I beg to repeat a Question which I put to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs yesterday. I wish to know, Whether the Government have received communications to the effect that exactions and contributions have been levied by the Prussian army pending the armistice; and whether it is in accordance with the terms of the armistice, as defined by the Conference, that these contributions or exactions should be levied?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the conditions of the armistice were quite clear as to this—that no fresh contributions should be levied. There is some ambiguity as to the understanding between the parties, whether contributions which were ordered before the armistice were to continue to be levied. But my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office is in communication with the Prussian Government on the subject.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR: Was it not understood that provisions were to be paid for during the armistice?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, Yes, clearly.

ARMY—THE GUARDS IN CANADA.

QUESTION.

MAJOR KNOX said, he wished to ask, Whether it is true that the Guards have been ordered home from Canada, and whether other troops have been ordered out in their place?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it has been decided that two battalions of Guards and one battalion of the Military Train should come home from Canada without relief.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—CAPTAIN GRANT'S SYSTEM OF COOKING.—ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL NORTH, in calling attention to the services of Captain Grant, and moving an Address to Her Majesty praying for the grant of some suitable reward, complained that the Board which had been appointed to inquire into the merits of Captain Grant's invention had not been fairly constituted. Captain Grant's apparatus had been spoken of in terms of approval by several distinguished general officers, by official Boards, and by two Secretaries of State. It was now said that improvements had been made in the apparatus; but he should like to know the invention in which improvements had not been made. The man who originated the principle ought to be rewarded; and Captain Grant said that his principle had been adopted, though there were alterations in the details. His noble Friend the Secretary for War had spoken of the great reduction caused in one item of the Army Estimates by the saving in the consumption of fuel. As Captain Grant's apparatus had been in use for the last eight years, there could be no doubt that much of the saving was to be attributed to the invention for which the gallant captain claimed remuneration. His hon. and gallant Friend (General Lindsay) had proposed that the remuneration to Captain Grant should be equal to the amount saved in one year's consumption of fuel. In reply to that proposition, the late Sir George Lewis said there was no precedent for making a grant of £25,000 or £30,000 for services like those of Captain Grant; thereby acknowledging that by Captain Grant's invention from £25,000 to £30,000 had been saved in the annual consumption of coal. He wanted to know whether Captain Grant himself had been shelved, although the service and the public had the advantage of his invention. Only two years ago, when a force of 12,000 was sent to Canada, Captain Grant was sent for to know if he could prepare cooking apparatus for the force; and within one month he prepared the necessary kitchens for that number of men. Sir Rowland Hill had been rewarded, and properly so, for his improvement in the postal system; and within the last two or three years Parliament had voted a sum of £5,000 to the gentleman who had enabled us to separate our postage stamps without tearing them. We were spending millions sterling for improving the arms used in the destruction of our enemies; and he thought the House ought not to refuse a fair recompense to a man who had contributed so much to the comfort of the soldier, and effected such a saving in our army service. Under these circumstances, he begged to move that this House would, on Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to consider the services of Captain Grant, and order him some suitable reward for his services in improving the system of Cooking in the Army, and effecting a considerable saving in the Public Expenditure for Fuel."—(Colonel North),

—instead thereof.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, this question had been before the House for a long time, and the House had on a previous occasion come to a decision after full discussion and consideration; and he did hope that if his hon. and gallant Friend divided on the present occasion the House would come to a final conclusion on the subject. He hoped they would pronounce an opinion that would be decisive, and would show they were not willing that Captain Grant's claims should be perpetually coming before them. The question was originally brought forward on a Motion by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Wigan (General Lindsay) declaring that Captain Grant ought to receive remuneration. That Motion was negative, but only by a narrow majority; and on subsequent occasions in the same Session the subject was brought before the House. Later in the Session, the hon. and gallant Member for Wigan again asked Sir George Lewis whether, considering the narrow majority against his Motion, the case ought not to be deemed one for a Commission? Sir George Lewis promised that an inquiry by Commission should take place. A Commission was appointed; and the Commissioners came to the conclusion that no further remuneration ought to be given to Captain Grant. Again, last Session, the hon. and gallant Member for Wigan brought the subject forward; and his noble Friend (Lord De Grey) and himself having considered the case, came to the conclusion that although Captain Grant had received all he was entitled to under the conditions upon which he had offered his services, although he had been allowed his expenses, and although different sums of money had been paid to him which were intended by the Government of the day to be payment in full for his services, still as he had devoted a good deal of time to the public service his case was one which might be inquired into with the view of seeing whether Government would be justified in offering him further remuneration. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel North) had criticized the constitution of the Board to which this last inquiry had been intrusted; but, as he understood, General Lindsay before he went to Canada expressed himself satisfied with its constitution. Captain Grant did not say he asked remuneration for any benefit or increase of comfort he had conferred on the soldier—he said he rested his claim on one point—namely, that he was entitled to compensation for the annual saving in the consumption of fuel which had been effected by his apparatus. Now the Commission had examined into that point; and they said in their Report they were unable conscientiously to declare that any saving of fuel was to be attributed to Captain Grant's apparatus independently of other causes. He rested his claim on a Report of 1856 received from the garrison of Woolwich, by which it appeared that a very large consumption of fuel had taken place there. The quantity stated in the Report as to what had been consumed was in excess of the regulations; and if it had been used, the excess must have been paid for by the men and not by the Government. Other reports were made from other stations; and at Brompton Barracks, for instance, it was found that under the old system 80 lb. of fuel was sufficient to cook for eighty men, being 1 lb. per man, which was under the allowance given for Captain Grant's system. The saving of fuel was not due so much to any particular apparatus as to the men being instructed in the economical use of fuel. It was admitted that Captain Grant deserved great credit for having called attention to the defective state of the arrangements formerly existing; but in 1858 the Commission on the Sanitary Condition of the Army went fully into all questions of this sort, and it was absurd to suppose that if Captain Grant had not called attention before to the subject, the attention of the Commission would not have been directed to it, and that all the improvements subsequently made would not have been made in 1858, even if Captain Grant had not brought forward his apparatus. Captain Grant's system was merely an adaptation of a system formerly known, and there was no inherent saving of fuel in it. It was not placed in any new barrack now erected. A system was now in use much more like the old one, by which steel boilers were substituted for the old cast iron ones; and the consumption of fuel did not exceed from  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. to  $\frac{3}{4}$  lb. daily per man. It was quite understood by the hon. and gallant Member for Wigan last year that the Commission was to settle the question, and he was surprised that the hon. and gallant Gentleman should have brought it forward again. Any hon. Gentleman who would take the trouble to read through the evidence would see that the case on which Captain Grant claimed so large a remuneration had not been made out. The Commission, however, took into consideration that, for several years, Captain Grant's suggestions had been encouraged by Lord Panmure and other Secretaries for War, and that he had been employed, with little intermission, for several years, and they were of opinion that though no engagement had been made with Captain Grant, and though it was never understood that he should be entitled to anything beyond the expenses he incurred, still there was no reason why he should not be remunerated for his services. If Captain Grant had asked for any such remuneration the War Office would probably have given him the full pay of his rank, which was that of a captain of artillery, while he was employed on his experiments. It was thought now that £1,000 would be a fair sum to offer him, and that sum had been offered to him. Whether that offer had been accepted by him he was not aware; but he submitted that Captain Grant's own claim, founded on a supposed saving of fuel, had not been made out by him.

AFFAIRS OF CHINA.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAXTER, in rising to call attention to the state of affairs in China, and to put a Question to the First Lord of the Treasury on the subject, said, he was unwilling to take any course which might be considered unfriendly to Her Majesty's Government. He did not share in the general dissatisfaction which had been expressed by hon. Gentlemen opposite with respect to their recent management of our foreign policy; on the contrary, he entirely approved of the course Her Majesty's Ministers had pursued in Europe and America, and which had ensured the continuance of our peaceful relations with those countries. But it was because he approved of their policy of peace and non-interference in Europe and America, that he disapproved of their policy of war and interference in China. He believed the time had come when a stop ought to be put to a course of proceeding which was not creditable to British arms, and which, if it were much longer persisted in, might lead us into difficulties, the importance of which it would be hardly possible to exaggerate. He objected to the policy of assisting the Imperial Government in China for two reasons: in the first place, because he believed that in doing so we were acting on a bad principle; and, in the second place, because he did not think our efforts in that direction were likely to be attended with success. He did not, however, deem it necessary, after the exhaustive speeches which had been made on the subject by the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) and the noble Lord the Member for Cocker-mouth (Lord Naas), to enter very largely into details on the present occasion. As a merchant owning goods in the treaty ports of China, he did not hesitate to confess that he naturally wished those goods to be protected; but it was, he admitted, a doubtful question whether he was justified in calling upon the general body of the taxpayers of this country to contribute their money with that object, under the exceptional circumstances in which China was placed. Be that, however, as it might, he felt perfectly convinced that he was not, as a representative of the people, justified in voting away their money to assist a dynasty in that country which he looked upon as utterly effete and tottering to its fall. He should, no doubt, be met at the outset by the argument, that Her Majesty's Government had done nothing more than defend the treaty ports; and the Under Secretary of State, indeed, had over and over again maintained that we had been guilty in China of no breach of neutrality; but if the hon. Gentleman would read the speeches which he had made on the subject, he would find that while seeking to justify everything that had been done there, and everybody by whom it had been done, and doing so with great ability, he had admitted more than once that our policy in China had been neither impartial nor uniform. The papers which had been laid on the table of the House did not, at all events, bear out the statement that we had been guilty in that country of no breach of neutrality. In the first despatch of Mr. Hammond to Sir Edward Lugard, in April 1863, he found it stated that Earl Russell did not deny that there was inconvenience in the state of things pointed out by the Commander-in-Chief, but that Her Majesty's Government could not allow British officers who were only temporarily detached from their regiments to be making war on the Taepings all over China. Again, in March of the same year, Sir Frederick Bruce wrote to General Stavelo to the effect, that he was very anxious it should be borne in mind that we were not making war on the Taepings; while, in the month of June, the Secretary for the Admiralty, in writing to Mr. Hammond, said he was commanded by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to send for the information of Earl Russell a copy of a letter dated 14th of the previous April from Admiral Kuper, respecting the proceedings of Captain Dew, of the Encounter, at Show-Shing, and to state that the Admiral had been instructed to inform Captain Dew that he had exceeded his instructions in taking part in hostilities beyond the prescribed limit of thirty miles. Now, these instructions were all very well; but there were unfortunately other letters of the noble Lord which have a different aspect, as well as two letters from the Foreign Office, in the latter of which Mr. Hammond stated that he was directed by Earl Russell to say that, during the then existing state of affairs in the neighbourhood of Shanghai, British officers on full pay should be allowed to join the force under Major Gordon's command, and to serve beyond the thirty miles' radius. There was, besides, among the papers for 1862, a curious despatch setting forth the opinions of the noble Lord with respect to the discipline to be observed in the British contingent in China. So that the instructions given on the one side of the question might, he thought, very well be set off against those given on the other. He would, however, appeal from the instructions to the facts, and he believed the facts justified him in saying that, if the instructions enjoined upon our officers a policy of neutrality, those instructions had been violated times without number; and whatever might have been our professions, our policy had been one of actual co-operation with the cruel and corrupt Government of the Mantchou Tartars. We had broken our neutrality by our early operations within the thirty miles' radius round Shanghai, and subsequently by our operations at Ningpo, which was taken by a force commanded by Captain Dew. Our neutrality was again broken when the Commander-in-Chief of the British forces at Shanghai appointed Major Gordon to the command of the Chinese auxiliaries. What was the character of these allies of ours, and what had been the proceedings of the men with whom it had been thought right to associate the soldiers of a Christian nation? The barbarities which were committed at Soochow were a sufficient answer to this question; but the blue-books were full of instances of the cruelty and perfidy of the Imperialists, and Sir Frederick Bruce had over and over again remonstrated with the Chinese Government upon the subject of the barbarous cruelties committed by their soldiers, which cruelties were defended by Prince Kung, the very man who was held up in that House by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as a man of humanity and enlightenment. He now came to his second objection to the policy of upholding the Tartar dynasty—that it was not likely to succeed. In point of fact, we had been endeavouring to uphold a foreign dynasty which had never established itself in the affections of the people, and which those who had travelled in China told us would have fallen long ago if it had not been for foreign interference. This was a fact which had a strong bearing on the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government. Abbé Huc, a French missionary who had long resided in China, wrote that of late years morality, arts, and industry had decayed, that poverty and destitution were making rapid progress, and that since the accession of the Mantchou dynasty Chinese society had undergone a great alteration for the worse. Captain Blakiston, in his work entitled Five Years on the Yang-tze, declared that since the accession of the Tartar dynasty everything in the empire had fallen into a languishing and expiring condition, and that the rebellion against the Government was by no means confined to the Taepings, but extended very generally over the population; and he protested against the British Government making this confusion worse confounded by interference in their internal affairs. He had rather accept this testimony, agreeing as it did with the evidence of all missionaries and travellers, than the statements of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who represented everything as coulour de rose. Sir Frederick Bruce and our Consul at Shanghai told a very similar tale. It had been asked, How it was that if the Mantchou dynasty was so weak it had held power so long? The answer was, that it was a noticeable fact that no revolution had ever been accomplished in China until after years of convulsion, insurrection, and civil war; and he, in his turn, might ask how it happened, if the Taepings were so universally detested as had been represented in that House, that fears were so generally entertained lest the Imperialist troops and the auxiliary forces themselves should go over to the rebels. He had observed with regret the support given by the Government to the expedition sent out under Captain Sherard Osborn, and more particularly the parting benediction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he rejoiced at its failure because it opened to us an escape from a situation of great embarrassment and difficulty. He hoped that we should date from that event a total change in British policy in China. Our whole policy with reference to China had for many years past been not a "comedy of errors," but a "tragedy of errors." He freely admitted that the whole blame did not rest with the present Government or the late Government, but must be shared by both Houses of Parliament and by the country; and his object was not to cast reproaches upon anyone for what had been done in the past, but to provide security for the future. In the last sentence of a despatch written in June, 1860, Sir Frederick Bruce said—

"No course could be so well calculated to lower our national character as to yield our material support to a Government the corruption of whose authorities is only checked by its weakness."

That was what we had been doing, and our Ambassador still adhered to his opinion of the impolicy of our conduct. Only the other day his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) brought out the fact that in June, 1863,

Sir Frederick Bruce, in concert with the other Ambassadors at Peking, signed a memorandum in which he expressed these same views, and complained of the employment of British officers in the Imperial service. That memorandum had been presented to the American Congress; but it had been suppressed by our Foreign Office, because if it had been produced the House would have seen the difference between the course recommended by our Minister in China and the Government at home, and the Government would have been forced to change their policy. In June or July last year, the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in replying to the noble Lord the Member for Coker-mouth (Lord Naas), entreated the House to wait for one year and see the result of the policy which was then being pursued. They had waited a year—they had seen the result of that policy—and every word of warning which was spoken by the noble Lord the Member for Coker-mouth had been proved to be true. Therefore, the Question which he had to ask the noble Viscount at the head of the Government—whom he was sure that they were all delighted to see again in his place—was, whether the Government meant in future to adhere strictly and honourably to the defence of British property in the treaty ports, refusing every kind of aid, direct or indirect, to the Imperialists, and abandoning altogether the attempt to bolster up and support the Government of Peking? He should also like to know what instructions, if any, had been sent to Her Majesty's servants in China with reference to this important Question; and whether they had been enjoined for the future, not only not to accept employment under the Imperial dynasty, but to take no step, however indirect, to support the Government of the Emperor? Every one acquainted with the history of India must be struck with the remarkable analogy between the position of that country when English merchants resorted to it in the time of Hastings and Clive, and our present position in China. We had only just begun to develop the civilization of India, which had so recently been transferred to the Government of Her Majesty, and we ought to beware of increasing our responsibilities by mixing up ourselves in the internal affairs of so vast a country as China.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am quite ready to answer the Question of my hon. Friend, but I must be allowed to say I regret, that though my hon. Friend says that he has studied with great attention all the blue-books on the subject of China that have been presented to Parliament, and notwithstanding the acuteness of his mind and the ability which he shows on all occasions, he has come to conclusions which are not supported by the materials which he says he has searched and digested. My hon. Friend started with a general theory; but nothing is so liable to mislead as a general theory. My hon. Friend said that the principle upon which the British Government ought to act is that of non-intervention in the affairs of other States; a very plausible principle, and one which in many cases ought to be strictly adhered to; but my hon. Friend forgets that there are cases in which we have treaty rights—that there are cases in which we have national interests—and if his doctrine were to be applied rigidly and in every case, our treaty rights would be abandoned and our national interests would be sacrificed. It is not true that non-intervention is the principle invariably acted on by the British Government. We have interfered with great success in the affairs of other countries, and with great benefit to the countries concerned. We so interfered, for instance, in the affairs of Greece, and we established the independence of that State. We interfered in the affairs of Belgium, and we established the independence of Belgium as a separate State. We interfered in the affairs of Portugal, and enabled Portugal to obtain a free and Parliamentary constitution. We interfered in the affairs of Spain with like success and with a similar result. We interfered in the affairs of Turkey, of Syria, and of Egypt, and we maintained the integrity of the Turkish empire. We interfered in the Crimean war, and I do not think any man in this House will say that in that struggle we were unsuccessful. We have interfered in the affairs of China. Why? Because our treaty rights were endangered and our national interests were at stake. See how inconsistent my hon. Friend was at the beginning of his speech and in its conclusion. At the beginning he said he would never, as a Member of this House, consent to throw on the taxpayers of this country burdens for the sake of protecting his own individual interests in China.

MR. BAXTER said, the noble Lord had not properly caught his meaning. His observations referred to upholding the Imperial dynasty in China.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend said it was quite true he had merchandise and interests in China, and that he would not call on the taxpayers of this country to protect them.

MR. BAXTER: I said that might be an open question.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend now says that would be an open question. But, at all events, in the question which he put to me at the conclusion of his speech, there was no uncertainty whatever; because he asked whether the Government would confine themselves to maintaining the security of our establishments in the treaty ports, in one of which I suppose his property must lie. I am bound to say that I quite concur in the propriety of maintaining and defending the security of British interests in the treaty ports. But what has been the history of our interference in China? See the inconsistency of these mercantile gentlemen. They are constantly urging the Government to make treaties of commerce with foreign countries, and to extend the range of our commercial intercourse. Only the other day I received a deputation from the manufacturing districts urging that a re-organization of the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade should take place, for the purpose of enabling the Government more adequately to extend the commercial relations of this country. And the feeling no doubt was honestly entertained, because everybody must know that on the extension of our commerce depends, in a very great degree, the prosperity of our country, the accumulation of our capital, the abundance of our revenue, and the strength and prosperity of the nation. Any measure, therefore, calculated to increase the commercial relations of the country, so far from meriting the censure which my hon. Friend, as a commercial man, thought fit to pass upon it, is deserving of praise, because it accords with the wishes and interests of the country. It was long felt that trade with China would open a vast field of commercial enterprise to us; and there can be no doubt that, among other things, the great expansion of commerce with that empire has contributed to enable us to meet without disaster the unfortunate obstructions to our commerce and manufactures occasioned by events still going on in America. My hon. Friend says that the Chinese, especially the Imperialists, are a cruel people. Well, I have myself said in this House, and I repeat it, that the characteristics of the Chinese population are cruelty and perfidy. But those qualities are not confined to Imperialists—they are shared in a far higher degree by the Taepings, who are peculiar objects of interest to some hon. Members of this House. My hon. Friend talks of a massacre at Soochow. There was no massacre. ["Oh, oh!"] There was a very treacherous act committed towards the Whangs, who were decoyed into the power of the Tartar commander, the Footai, who revenged upon them what he stated to have been an act of great barbarity committed by them on a former occasion. I will not justify in any degree what the Footai did. I am merely stating the extenuation put forward by him. But what happened the other day?—and this is a specimen of the acts of which Taepings are capable—there was a little steamer called the Firefly, which they seized and carried off, and it was stated and not contradicted, that four or five unhappy persons who were on board the vessel, were roasted to death.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: By the Taepings.

COLONEL SYKES: No, no!

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I believe their bodies were found in a charred state, but there is no other proof of the fact. Of course persons in the interest of these people—who like to carry on a contraband trade with the Taepings, and to make a profit by supplying them with arms and ammunition—send home to their acquaintances high-flown panegyrics on the Taepings; but every impartial person writing from China, bears witness to the desolation marking the track of the Taepings. The districts which they occupy are laid waste, the people reduced to starvation; and only the other day we heard of a place in which the people were obliged to eat human flesh as a last resource. Is that a state of things conducive to British commerce? Is that a state of things the extension of which to the immediate neighbourhood of our treaty ports we ought to permit? My hon. Friend does not deny that as far as the radius of thirty miles from these ports extends, we are justified in what we have done, and that it is our duty to keep these marauding Taepings from making piratical incursions within those limits. But my hon. Friend who says he has carefully studied the blue-books, has not studied with equal care the history of China. He talked of the present dynasty as a foreign dynasty; and though he did not say, he certainly implied that it had been recently established in a conquered country, and, therefore, had no root in the affections of the population. If I am not misinformed, I rather think the dynasty has been the best part of 500 years in possession of the throne. [Colonel SYKES: No, 250 or 260 years.] Well, when a dynasty has been established in a country for 250 years, I think that we, in England at least, ought to admit that it is well rooted, has a good hold on the population of the country, and is no longer entitled to be called a foreign dynasty. I say that it is greatly to the interest of this country to maintain those commercial rights which the treaty concluded with China assured to us. When first the war with China began, Sir James Graham, a sagacious man, warned this House of the danger that must arise from entering into war with a third portion of the human race. I return that argument to my hon. Friend, and I say what must be the commercial advantages to this country if it can have an unimpeded, uninterrupted commerce with one-third of the human race? It is, therefore, for our interests that tranquillity should be restored in China. My hon. Friend says that the Mantchoo dynasty is tottering to its fall. I can only judge from what reports reach us; but I should rather be inclined to say that the rebellion is more likely to end than the dynasty to be overthrown. No doubt in so large an empire as China there are parts which are always threatened or disturbed by rebellion more or less violent, but that, I am sorry to say, is the normal state of many of those Oriental Governments which lack the organization and energy necessary to maintain order throughout their entire dominions. Such has been the condition of Turkey; such has been peculiarly the condition of China, whose central government has always had the greatest difficulty in maintaining order in its remoter provinces. But I can assure my hon. Friend that, as far as we can trust the accounts which reach us, the Taeping rebellion has been narrowed to a much more restricted circle than it occupied some years ago; and that if we are to speculate on the future it will be safer to reckon that the rebellion is tending towards extinction, than that the Imperial dynasty is tottering to its fall. Besides, what must happen if the Imperial Government be overthrown? You would have nothing but extensive anarchy. The Taepings are perfectly incapable of ruling the empire, and if they attempted to do so there would soon be fresh rebellions against them. In reply to my hon. Friend, I have stated that our interference as a direct interference has been limited to the treaty ports; but we certainly did give to the Chinese Government the assistance of British advice and arrangement in collecting their Customs and improving their revenue, and great benefits have resulted to the Chinese Government from that assistance. Last year we issued an order authorizing Captain Osborn and others acting under Mr. Lay to raise a squadron for the purpose of restoring order in the waters of China, and getting rid of the pirates who endanger navigation. My hon. Friend says that when the expedition started he foretold its failure. Perhaps in that respect he was a better judge of Chinese character than we were. It certainly did fail, owing to the jealousies which existed between the central and provincial Governments, and to their desire to subject Captain Osborn to restraints and restrictions which he felt it would not be for his honour or for the advantage of this country that he should submit to. I regret very much that the expedition of Captain Sherard Osborn did not succeed, because I believe that if it had gone on, and if Captain Osborn had been allowed to direct it according to his views, it would have put an end to that piracy which is now desolating all the coasts of China. That Order in Council has been revoked, and there is no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to issue such an Order again. Then there was another Order in Council, authorizing British subjects to enter into the service of China. Major Gordon was one of those who took advantage of that Order in Council. It has, however, been revoked, and there is no intention of renewing it. Major Gordon, I am sorry to see by the last accounts, has sustained a check, and has been wounded—I hope not severely. He is a most able and distinguished officer, and one who has performed great services for the Imperial Government. My conviction is that if the Imperial Government could by his or any other means put down the rebellion, not only would they gain a great advantage for themselves, but they would confer an immense advantage upon the commercial interests of this country. All I can say is that it is not our intention to authorize any direct interference in the military or naval service of China as between the Imperial Government and the Taepings, beyond the protection to be -afforded within a radius around our treaty ports. That is a duty which Her Majesty's Government owe to the commercial interests of this country, and I am quite convinced that if the commercial interests were assembled and were asked their opinion, they would say, "For Heaven's sake protect our commerce in China in the treaty ports." That commerce is daily assuming more and more importance, and is one of the means by which this country has weathered the difficulty arising out of the diminished supply of cotton from America. I trust my hon. Friend will be satisfied with what I have stated, although I cannot agree with him in the conclusions he draws or the objects he desires to attain. My opinion is that the country at large will be of opinion that the Government are doing their duty in protecting the commercial interests of this country in China, as defined by the treaty with China; and so far is it from being desirable that the Tartar dynasty—that is, the Imperial Government—should be overthrown, and that these ragamuffin Taepings should get the advantage, I am convinced that those who know anything about China will feel it to be an object of immense importance that order and tranquillity should be restored in a country in which our commercial relations are so extensive.

MR. LIDDELL said, the noble Lord had expressed a hope that his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) would be satisfied with the explanation which he had given to his statement. He (Mr. Liddell) trusted that the House of Commons would not express themselves contented with the answer just given by the noble Lord, for a more unsatisfactory answer than that of the noble Lord he had never heard. He (Mr. Liddell) felt himself compelled to offer a few observations in reply to some of the most glaring inconsistencies it had ever been his lot to listen to from a responsible Minister of the Crown. The noble Lord spoke with the natural pride of an Englishman of the extension of our trade in China, which extension, the noble Lord said, was due to the policy of Her Majesty's Government; and in the very next sentence the noble Lord spoke of the desolation of the country, owing to what he called the inroads of the rebels. But he (Mr. Liddell) would ask, in whose hands had been the great producing districts of China? When the noble Lord accused his hon. Friend behind him of not having read the despatches, he (Mr. Liddell) must, with great deference, accuse the noble Lord of not having studied the question himself, for if he had he must have known that the great producing districts from which there had been that increase of trade, in which the noble Lord took such natural pride, had been in the hands of the rebels for many years. The hon. Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs shook his head at the statement. Did he mean to deny it? If the hon. Gentleman did mean to deny it, he would find it a matter of great difficulty to prove the contrary of what he (Mr. Liddell) had just asserted. Then the noble Lord told the House that the rebellion was waning; and in the next sentence he said that our disciplined troops headed by a distinguished English officer had received a severe check, and that that officer had been wounded. He (Mr. Liddell) learned from the last accounts that the French contingent had also received a check; and in the opinion of persons on the spot there was a great probability of Major Gordon being cut off with his whole force. Now, it did so happen that the successes of the rebels had been very considerable of late, and had followed each other in rapid succession, even since the last debate in that House. Those were facts which went to prove that at any rate the rebellion was not now in so waning a state as the noble Lord appeared to suppose. The noble Lord had defended the policy of the Government in China, and said it was intended to continue it. He (Mr. Liddell) wished to ask the noble Lord whether he had studied the advice given him by his own Envoy? because, if he had, he would find that the Government policy on many important points had been absolutely disapproved by his own Envoy. Sir Frederick Bruce was opposed on many material points to the whole of the Government policy in China. He desired to ask the noble Viscount whether he had or had not confidence in his own Envoy? Did he intend to abide by his advice or to recall him? Sir Frederick Bruce was the representative of British interests in China, and seemed to have omitted no opportunity of expressing his objections to the policy of the Government. Now it behoved the Government to do one of two things—either to listen to the despatches of their own Ambassador, or to recall him in consequence of the advice which he had given. There was one sentence in the noble Lord's speech which was particularly significant. The noble Lord began by saying that general theories were likely to mislead. He (Mr. Liddell) did not know whether that observation of the noble Lord was applicable to the speech made the other night from the Treasury benches in his absence. If it were, he ventured to express his belief that if the noble Lord had been present those very misleading general theories, which had been uttered very recently by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would very possibly not have been heard in that House. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Question, question.] Well, he (Mr. Liddell) admitted that that reference did not bear precisely upon the immediate question before the House. He must, however, say that he was disposed to agree in opinion with the noble Lord, that general theories were very apt to mislead. He thought after what had passed—after the experience they had had of the working of the Government policy in China—that they had a right to expect from the lips of the Government a more complete enunciation of their policy in the interest of the trade which they professed to protect. Now, it had been over and over again stated in China, as well as in this country, that the policy pursued by the Government in China was prejudicial to the interests of our trade in that part of the world. The noble Viscount said that the Government interfered because our treaty rights were in danger. He wanted to know in what single instance had our treaty rights or our trade been endangered? He had asked that question before, and he now repeated it. He wished to know any instance in which either the property or the life of a British subject had been placed in danger, except on the recent occasion of the reprisals in the case of certain persons taken on board the Firefly. But the House should recollect that those reprisals were in consequence of the murders committed in Soochow. Those were the sort of acts which civil war naturally gave rise to, and in China the civil war had been pushed beyond its limits by our unhappy interference.

LORD NAAS said, he was unwilling to go at any length into this subject, because he could not do so without interfering with the discussion which must come on upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden); and at present there was no Question before the House except that the Speaker leave the Chair, and, therefore, it was impossible to ask the House to give an opinion on the subject.

Mr. Liddell

But though he should limit his observations on the present occasion, he was, nevertheless, fully alive to the importance of the Question. He could not, however, refrain from entering his protest against some of the assertions made by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston). He confessed he felt disappointed at finding that the events of the last year had made no impression upon the minds of Her Majesty's Government. When he heard the Question put by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), he was in hopes that the noble Lord would have informed the House that the new policy inaugurated in China was a failure, and would be given up, and that the Government intended to return to the policy followed about two years and a half ago. But the noble Lord, so far from making such a statement, had defended the policy of the Government, and actually told the House that they were determined to walk in the same path which they had been pursuing for the last eighteen or twenty months, observing, at the same time, that they were bound to protect our treaty rights as well as the property of British subjects in China. But what he (Lord Naas) said was, the policy of the Government went far beyond that. It was a policy calculated rather to endanger our treaty rights than to maintain them. Her Majesty's Government were interfering in every way in China and against the interests of the country. When the noble Lord talked of maintaining our treaty rights, he entirely misapprehended the question and the objects which those who took a comprehensive view of those subjects had really at heart. The object of those with whom he (Lord Naas) acted was to maintain and protect the treaty rights, but, at the same time, not to interfere in the internal or domestic affairs of the country. Now, Her Majesty's Government had interfered very actively in those affairs—had fitted out a fleet for the Imperial Government, and had lent them upwards of 100 officers to command the forces, not of the Emperor, but of the local and provincial authorities. It was an utter fallacy to say that those with whom he (Lord Naas) acted objected to the maintenance of treaty rights. He should be able to show on a future occasion that the Government had actually endangered those treaty rights, and that our merchants themselves were of opinion that our policy in China had risked the security of our trade in that quarter; and that our policy had been in direct con-tradition to the opinion not only of our naval commanders, but of many of our most eminent representatives. No one acquainted with the affairs of China but must see the danger of the course which the Government were now pursuing; and all who were competent to give an opinion on the matter were anxious that we should go back to the principles laid down by Earl Russell in his despatch immediately after the Treaty of Tien-tsin—these principles being in favour of non-interference in any way in the internal affairs of the empire. As he thought it quite impossible to go at length into the Question at that moment, he had only to express a hope that an early opportunity would be given to the House for a more general discussion upon the subject. It was one of the most important Questions that could be considered, and he believed when the time came for its calm consideration, both the country and the House would be made fully aware of the enormous danger of the policy which the Government were now pursuing in China.

COLONEL SYKES said, as there was a prospect of a full discussion upon this subject, he would limit himself to a few remarks. The noble Viscount justified his interference in China by saying that he had interfered in other countries, but he had overlooked the motives for interference, on those occasions. In Europe we had interfered to protect the rights of the people against oppressive Governments, and that interference was to our honour in the cases of Belgium, Portugal, and, to some extent, Spain; but in China we had interfered in behalf of a Government which had been described by Sir Frederick Bruce and others of our representatives there, as the most corrupt, treacherous, and cruel Government on the face of the earth. He held in his hand extracts from a despatch of the American Minister at Peking, which contained the real views of the representatives of the four great European Powers in China, namely Russia, France, America, and England—and which despatch had been presented as an official communication by the American Secretary of State to Congress. He (Colonel Sykes) came to a knowledge of the existence of Mr. Burlinghame's despatch in this wise. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs on a recent occasion had quoted a passage from Mr. Burlinghame's despatch to the American Secretary of State. To verify that quotation he (Colonel Sykes) consulted the despatch in the library, and to his amazement found reports of lengthened conversations between Mr. Burlinghame and Sir Frederick Bruce on the desirableness of the great European Powers pursuing a neutral policy in China—Russia and France entertained the same views. Mr. Burlinghame asked, whether Sir Frederick Bruce would inform the British Government of the views held in common, and his reply was, that he would not only do so, but give Mr. Burlinghame a copy of the despatch on the sole condition that it was not published in America until it had been published in England. It was for this despatch, part of which had been quoted for his own purposes by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and the rest suppressed, that he Colonel Sykes had asked and was told that it could not be produced without injury to the public service, although Congress had been informed of Sir Frederick Bruce's despatch and of its contents. He (Colonel Sykes) would read to the House some passages in Mr. Burlinghame's despatch of the 20th of June, 1863, and the House would then see, that the policy proposed was that which he (Colonel Sykes) and other Members had advocated in the House of Commons for the last four years. Mr. Burlinghame says—

"I expressed a warm desire that he (Sir Frederick Bruce) would present them (his views) to his Government, that they might become the basis of our future co-operation."

Mr. Burlinghame went on to say—

"He accordingly wrote the powerful despatch marked A, which he communicated to me for my private use, and which, with his permission, I send to you confidentially, with the most positive request that it is not to appear until it is first published in England. The three Ministers hailed with delight this frank avowal. The policy upon which we are agreed is briefly this, 'That while we claim our treaty right to buy and sell and hire in the treaty ports, subject, in respect to our rights of property and person, to the jurisdiction of our own Government, we will not ask for, nor take concessions of territory in the treaty ports, nor in any way interfere with the jurisdiction of the Chinese Government over its own people, nor ever menace the territorial integrity of the Chinese Empire. That we will not take part in the internal struggles in China, beyond what is necessary to maintain our treaty rights. That the latter we will unitedly sustain against all who may violate them.' To this end we are now clear in the policy of defending the treaty ports against the Taepings or rebels, but in such a way as not to make war upon that considerable portion of the Chinese people by following them into the interior of their country. In this connection, while we feel desirous from what we know of it to have the rebellion put down, still we have come to question the policy of lending Government officers to lead the Chinese in the field, for fear of complication among ourselves growing out of the relations to the employed, &c. That while we wish to give our moral support to the Government at the present time, the power in the country which seems disposed to maintain order and our treaty rights, we should prefer that it would organize its own people as far as possible for its own defence, taking only foreigners for instruction in the arts of peace or war, and these as far as possible from the smaller Treaty Powers."

Other parts of the despatch are worthy of the attention of the House; and it is to be lamented that with a knowledge of its contents the noble Viscount should justify our breaches of neutrality. It was stated by the noble Lord at the head of the Government that the Taepings had roasted four Europeans; but there was testimony from a person in China to the effect that those four persons said to have been roasted in December were alive in January. In contrast with the assertions made of the desolation which accompanied the march of the Taepings, he directed the attention of the House to the following description by Dr. Legg of the proceedings of the Imperialists. Dr. Legg is a most highly respected Missionary, who has been many years in China, and his letter is dated 1st October, 1862. He says—

"It behoves the British Parliament—the British people—to look to the new complication of affairs in China, to look it fully in the face. If we are to pacify the Empire, we shall require 50,000 troops, and may then find again that we have undertaken more than we are equal to. But, I ask, in whose interest are we to put down the rebellion? Hitherto, Admiral Hope has been acting in the interest of the Imperial Government. Now, I protest against our putting down the rebellion on behalf of the Imperial Government on two grounds. The first is, the ground of its cruelty. I have read harrowing accounts of the devastations of the rebels—how the country is blasted by their march. The accounts are, no doubt, true. But I have seen also the ways of the Imperial braves, and kept company with them for hours together. Their march over the country was like the progress of locusts and caterpillars. Their thirst for blood was quenchless; their outrages on the young and old were indescribable. On the score of cruelty the case must be about equal, inclining to the Imperialist side, if we may judge on the principle that the more cowardly are the more cruel."

Well, but the noble Viscount and others assert that the Taepings are desolators. Now I would make an appeal to the common sense of the House. If they were the desolators described, alighting like a swarm of locusts, and having destroyed the country taking a new flight and only alighting for more desolation, surely a most important article of export from China—namely, silk, could not have increased. There is, probably, no article of produce that requires more careful, persevering, and peaceful manipulation than the whole processes of silk production, from the hatching of the eggs, rearing of the worms, cultivation of the mulberry tree, and winding of the silk, to the bale packing; and yet the silk districts since they fell into the hands of the Taepings on the 26th of May, 1860, by the capture of Soochow, have annually sent an increasing amount to the Shanghai market, for I hold in my hand not only the annual Returns of the export of silk from Shanghai, but the monthly Returns. I will not enter into details, but give the general results for a few years past. In 1853, when the Taepings captured Nankin, the export from Canton and Shanghai was 25,571 bales, in 113 vessels. In the year 1851-2, the year before the Taepings captured Nankin, the export of silk from Canton and Shanghai was 23,040 bales, in 117 vessels. In 1857-8 the export from Canton and Shanghai was 60,736 bales, in 149 vessels. In 1860, when Soochow was taken by the Taepings, the export from Shanghai alone had risen to 69,137 bales; and, in the year 1862-3, to the 31st of May, the export was 83,264 bales; and for the last and present year, since Soochow was treacherously obtained from the Taepings by Major Gordon, the export of silk has fallen off to 44,000 bales, owing to the plunder of the country by the Imperialists, by the aid of Gordon and the British authorities; and yet, in the face of these facts, the friends of the Imperialists have the hardihood to assert that the Taepings are only hordes of banditti and ruthless desolators.

MR. GREGSON said, he was satisfied with the noble Lord's declaration, that the Order in Council had been withdrawn, and that the policy of the British Government would be confined to defending the treaty ports and defending British life and property, and would not be in any way directed to hostilities against either party in China. The expedition of Captain Osborn had, as stated by the hon. Member for Montrose, failed; but he regretted that that was the case, for its purpose was a noble one. The Chinese Government were very sincere in their application for that force, and promptly remitted the whole of the money to pay for the ships; but afterwards some interference took place on the part of the officers of the Chinese Government, and Captain Osborn would not submit to be placed under any Chinese authority. He must say that he regretted that the Chinese Government had not acted more consistently with their first intentions; for he believed that the valuable assistance which Captain Osborn's expedition might have afforded would have been of the greatest benefit to China. With regard to the silk districts, to which the hon. and gallant Member had just alluded, it was his opinion that they had been destroyed by the Taepings.

MR. KINNAIRD believed that Admiral Hope had the utmost desire to act with perfect good faith towards the Taepings, but experience showed that those people would not keep faith themselves. He concurred in thinking that Captain Osborn's expedition would have been of great benefit to the Imperial Government, and of great advantage to our trade in clearing the rivers of pirates; but, under the circumstances, Captain Osborn acted with great discretion in withdrawing his ships, though that step was a great loss to the Imperial Government in China.

THE ASHANTEE WAR.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: According to my notice, I rise to ask from Her Majesty's Government some explanation with regard to the war in which this country is engaged with the King of Ashantee—a subject which requires explanation no less than the more important question of the state of our relations with China which has just now been under discussion. I very much doubt if many hon. Members were aware of the fact that we are at this time engaged in a war with Ashantee, until a question relative to it was put the other night by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay). At that time I did not consider the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary was quite satisfactory; and since that time I have not only seen some very interesting and remarkable letters and statements in the public papers, but I have myself received private communications relative to the subject, and I have also had an opportunity of reading some private letters, which have convinced me that the time is come when the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government ought to be directed to this subject, and when Parliament has a right to expect that some information should be given regarding it. I want to ask, what are the causes and what are the objects of this war—if war it can be called—in which, according to the information which I have received, our brave countrymen are being sent to die, not by the hands of the enemy—for an enemy they have never seen—but through the effects of exposure to the deadly and pestilential climate of that country? Statements have reached me, which I hope will be contradicted, that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government—or I might say of the Government of Cape Coast Castle rather than of Her Majesty's Government, for I almost doubt if Her Majesty's Government are very fully informed of what is going on in that country—I understand it is the intention of the local Government to invade the territory of the King of Ashantee, a prince who, I believe, has always evinced a friendly disposition towards the people of this country, for the purpose of taking possession of his capital. If this be a true story, I think that of all the wild visionary schemes I ever heard of this seems one of the most hopeless and impossible. I have heard that the King of Ashantee has at his disposal a very considerable army; but whether he has or not, I believe his natural position makes him entirely independent of the services of any army—at all events, to resist our attack; for he can have no army so strong nor any fortress so impregnable as the dreadful climate and the pernicious atmosphere that prevail over the 150 miles which lie between his capital and the sea coast. The accounts which have reached me—I may be told the facts are exaggerated, but of that I cannot judge; I can only give them as I have them—are that the effects of this climate on the European constitution are of a most peculiar and painful kind. Life appears to be worth in the interior of the country not more than three weeks' purchase. When the dreadful disease of the country attacks an European the too deplorable consequence is loss of life. And another most painful peculiarity is, that in those cases in which life is not sacrificed reason very often is sacrificed, and many of our officers are said to have left that country in a state of idiocy the most painful and depressing. Another peculiar fact is, that the negroes who have been bred and reared in the West Indies appear to suffer as much from the effects of the climate as Europeans. I have seen a gentleman who lately left that country, who informed me that the wing of a negro West India regiment taken there in order to aid in the prosecution of this distressing war, numbering 700 strong, was landed on the Gold Coast, and five days after no fewer than 120 of these 700 negroes were hors de combat. I will only mention one other fact to illustrate the hopeless circumstances under which this war must be carried on. It is well known that the interior of the country is still more pestiferous and deadly than the coast; but in order to prosecute their idea of invading the territory of the King of Ashantee, I am told that a force of 400 men was sent 100 miles up country, and encamped on the banks of the river Prah. Out of that number, when the accounts I received left, 200 of these troops were hors de combat, and there were not, I was assured, more than eighty who could, in case of an action coming on, carry a musket into the field; out of nineteen field officers fifteen were disabled. These are most painful facts, and it is obviously the duty of the Government to take some steps in the matter. Brave men ought not to be exposed to such a dreadful fate. The letters I have seen have been written by officers attached to our forces, and more touching—more distressing letters I have never read—letters written by men with a spirit of endurance and calm resignation honourable to our army, but by men who felt they were sent to die an inglorious death. One officer, in writing to his family, said that he almost wished he could be exposed to a volley from his own company, for he should then know the worst; but no man could anticipate the horrors of being quartered in this deadly climate for an indefinite period. And then let me ask what is the expense of this war? I have heard it calculated that the military expenses of this absurd expedition is not less than £1,000 a day, and from reliable information I have received I should say the outlay must be at any rate from £12,000 to £14,000 per month. I hope the Government will be able to give a satisfactory explanation in regard to this subject; and to offer some assurance that this folly—I may say worse than folly—will be put a stop to. I trust the language of the right hon. Gentleman may afford some comfort to the many unhappy persons in this country who are daily expecting to hear of the sacrifice of dear friends or relatives in Africa, who have perished not like soldiers in the field, but under the fatal effects of a horrible climate.

Mr. CARDWELL: I entirely recognize the justice of the appeal which has been made to me, that I should state fully and frankly to the House all that I know on this subject. I am also glad that the right hon. Baronet has taken the opportunity of introducing the topic on the Question of the Motion for Supply rather than by a Question in the usual form, because I am thereby enabled to give a fuller explanation than I could have given to a Question to which the rules of the House permit only a categorical answer. The state of the case is as follows: As hon. Members are aware, the British forts on the Gold Coast constitute the whole of the actual possessions of the British Crown in those parts; but there is a wide territory, extending for some seventy miles up the river Prah, which separates what is called the British Protectorate from the territory of the King of Ashantee. In December, 1862, the Governor of the Gold Coast wrote to the Duke of Newcastle that the King of Ashantee had demanded the surrender of two persons fugitives from his dominions. One was a boy—an escaped slave—and the other was an older person, charged with having misappropriated a piece of rock gold, which by the law of Ashantee is the property of the Sovereign, and has to be accounted for to the King of Ashantee. The Governor of the Gold Coast examined into the allegations against the two fugitives, and found that there was not a tittle of evidence that either had been guilty of any crime which would justify his being given up to the King of Ashantee. There was, on the contrary, abundant reason to know that death was the fate that awaited them should they be surrendered. He accordingly declined to surrender these fugitives, saying that if he did so their blood would be on his head—a feeling in which I believe every Member of this House will sympathize, for no one would wish to see fugitives who have sheltered themselves under the protection of the British flag surrendered under such circumstances. The conduct of the Governor received the approval of the Duke of Newcastle. In the spring of 1863 a force of the King of Ashantee invaded the protected territory. They were met by forces partly organized and commanded by British officers and partly consisting of Native troops. The army of the King of Ashantee extended its ravages to within forty miles of the British possessions on the Gold Coast. About thirty towns or villages, as they are there called, consisting of Native settlements, some very small, and others comprising several hundred families, were destroyed. Many lives were sacrificed, and much agricultural produce was carried off. In the autumn of 1863 the Governor announced that the Ashantee forces had retired, threatening, however, to renew their incursions into the British territory as soon as they had planted their own crops. As a measure of defence the Governor suggested to my noble Friend that he should be authorized to carry on war, if necessary, across the river Prah, and attack the territory of the King of Ashantee. To this request my noble Friend gave his assent in terms which I will read to the House—

“The principle of all military proceedings on the West Coast of Africa should be that of defence, and not of aggression. It is upon this principle alone that the Governors are authorized to make war, and no invasion of neighbouring territories can be sanctioned, unless it can be shown that it is really a defensive measure, safer, less costly in blood and money, and more likely to be decisive in its results than waiting for an attack which is being prepared. . . . His Grace feels, therefore, that he cannot refuse to Governor Pine a conditional authority to strike a blow within the Ashantee territory, if such a blow can be struck without making any other or further advance than, in his own opinion and that of the officer in command, may be consistent with the utmost consideration for the safety of the troops.”

I am prepared to lay the whole document on the table, but I have read that passage in order that it may be seen that the principle authorized by my noble Friend was defence not aggression, and that no aggression on the territory of the King of Ashantee was contemplated by him. Re-inforcements were ordered to be sent from the West Indies to assist the Governor of Cape Coast Castle in the proposed expedition, and every precaution was taken to secure the health and wellbeing of the troops, so far as having a first-rate commissariat, medical aid, and proper means of transport was concerned. When a Question was put to me the other night by the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay) this was the amount of the information which had reached the Colonial Office—that our military commander was on the Prah, waiting for re-inforcements, which he expected, but which had not reached him, from the West Indies, and that on their arrival he intended to begin the operations authorized by the Duke of Newcastle. Since that time, however, we have received another mail from the West Coast of Africa; and now I have to relate the story up to the latest advices. Last year the rains were unusually light, but whereas they commonly begin in May, this year they set in with unusual violence and severity in March, and the consequence was that the transports with re-inforcements from the West Indies had not reached the Gold Coast when the rains began. With the rains came sickness, and with sickness came the necessity for sending back to the coast all the troops which had been gathered upon the Prah for the purpose of making the intended expedition into Ashantee, excepting those companies—three in number—which were left to protect the stores and provisions collected upon the banks of the river. The last despatch I received from Governor Pine, dated April 5, contains a statement to the effect that he was afraid it would not be practicable to leave those companies upon the Prah, and the last despatch of all that has reached me, written only two days later, was not from Mr. Pine himself, but from an acting Governor, and it informed me that the Governor not having been able to carry into effect his purpose of having a personal conference with the military commander as to the state of affairs and the proper measures to be taken, had been compelled to take a cruise in the Rattlesnake for the restoration of his health. Such is the state of information in which we find ourselves placed by the last mail. I may be fairly asked what is the course we intend to take in these circumstances? The last mail, as I have said, has only reached me within the last few days; but since its arrival I have been in communication with my noble Friend at the head of the War Department, and also with his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, as to what ought to be done in the present state of affairs; and now I have to inform the House that the determination at which we have arrived, and which I propose to announce to the authorities on the spot by the mail which leaves England on Monday next, is this—that transports shall be immediately despatched to remove from the Coast troops to the amount of those who have recently been sent there, so that the number may be reduced to that which can be accommodated with the means ordinarily available upon the Gold Coast, due regard being had to health and comfort; that the forces shall be altogether removed from the interior; that the stockades which have been erected shall be handed over to the Native chiefs interested in the protection of the country; and that the stores shall be removed so far as the circumstances of the case may render it practicable to do so. I believe, however, it will not be any considerable pecuniary sacrifice to give those which cannot be removed to the friendly Native forces which may be told off to garrison the stockades erected on the banks of the river. But even if such an act did involve a considerable pecuniary sacrifice, I am sure the feeling of the House will be that a sense of duty would compel us to incur it rather than to put in peril the lives of our officers and men in such a climate. I have stated what was the origin of the war. I have stated what were the views and objects with which my noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle sanctioned an incursion on our part into the territory of the King of Ashantee, and that it was not any aggression upon the territory of the King of Ashantee. I have stated that he had no intention to undertake any war of conquest or of vengeance; that his only desire was to ward off a threatened attack, and that no measures have been taken except with that view. With respect to what has occurred since I have had the honour of filling the office I now hold, I have stated the contents of the mail received only a few days ago, and have informed the House that, in conjunction with the War Office and the Horse Guards, I have taken measures for withdrawing our troops from the interior of the country and placing the defence of the Prah in the hands of those Native chiefs whose duty and interest it is to protect their own territories from hostile incursions. We also propose, as far as possible, to provide for the safety, health, and well-being of our troops on the Gold Coast. Though it is impossible to speak with any certainty as to unknown and unforeseen occurrences, I entirely sympathize with the feeling that it is not our duty to make expeditions into the interior in such a climate as that of Africa. We have no desire whatever for any extension of territory; we have no wish to make wars of conquests or of vengeance; and as the rains have put an end to the late warlike preparations, so it is not our intention to renew them for the purpose of invading the territory of the King of Ashantee. I have already presented a Return, which, so far as I know, will give the information asked for by the right hon. Gentleman, but if any further information is required I shall be most happy to furnish it.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was sure it would be extremely satisfactory to the House to know that the war with the King of Ashantee was about to terminate. He was afraid, however, it would not terminate with either honour or advantage to our arms. It appeared to him that some blame attached to the Government for the want of provision for the troops sent to the hot climate of the Gold Coast. The Colonial Secretary had talked of having sent an excellent commissariat officer to Cape Coast; but it was not possible to provide supplies for British troops in such a country, and the excellence of the officer would hardly make up for the want of food. He knew from personal experience that cattle could not live on the Gold Coast, and that it was necessary to kill and salt them as soon as landed. In that hot climate, where a fourth of our men were within a short period laid up with dysentery, how was it possible to feed them with salted provisions? He trusted measures would immediately be taken to remove our officers and men to some climate in which they would have a chance of being restored to an effective state. There was one point upon which the Colonial Secretary had not touched. At present the friendly Native forces were subsidized to assist us in the Ashantee war. He was informed, however, by persons recently returned from the spot, that the chiefs never expressed any desire for the protection we were affording them, and that they were only induced to aid us by liberal pay. He was also informed that the value of all the villages destroyed by the Ashantee forces, which appeared so formidable to English notions, did not exceed £400, and that the friendly Native chiefs would rather have that sum paid in money than the defence and protection of our arms. If that information were correct, the House would probably agree with him that the payment of £400 would be far more economical than either the prolongation of the war or the continuance of the subsidy to the Native chiefs.

SUPPLY — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

The following Votes were agreed to :—

(1.) £517, to complete the sum for Embassy Houses, &c., at Paris and Madrid.

(2.) £3,201, Embassy Houses, &c., at Constantinople.

(3.) £75,000, New Foreign Office.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, in the present thin state of the House, he doubted whether it was proper to proceed with the discussion of the Estimates, that the Estimate for this work had been increased since last year from £200,000 to £228,000, and there was an extra item of £4,899 now brought forward for the first time for abortive designs. He supposed that those designs had been prepared on the sole authority of the Board of Works.

MR. COWPER said, that last year, when the Estimate for the new Foreign Office was brought forward, he stated to the House that the sum of £200,000 was the total amount which Mr. Scott, the architect, reckoned the erection of the building would cost. Since then, however, tenders had been received, the lowest of which amounted to £223,516. He stated at the time that the sum he named was the best estimate which Mr. Scott could furnish, but that the only real test would be the tenders. He did not now think that they had any reason to find fault with Mr. Scott's estimate, which he believed would have turned out correct if the work had been executed at the time it was made. But since then the price of labour and materials had risen in the market, and that fact accounted for the tender being higher than the estimate. The item of £4,899 charged for "preliminary expenses of designs for a Foreign Office which were not adopted" was not submitted to Parliament before because Mr. Scott abstained from sending in his claim until a final decision had been come to with regard to the Foreign Office. In that item was included the charge for the designs prepared by the direction of his predecessor the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) in the Gothic style, which style the House, after full consideration, deliberately determined to reject. That rejection, however, did not deprive Mr. Scott of his right to fair remuneration for his labour, because his designs enabled the House to judge of what would have been the character of the building in case they had adopted the Gothic style.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked when it was likely the new Foreign Office would be finished, and the enormous cost of hiring temporary accommodation put an end to?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH wished to know whether he was to understand that £5,000, in round numbers, had been expended without any previous sanction from that House, in preparing designs that were not adopted. That mode of bringing forward items of charge incurred four or five years ago was highly objectionable. There was very little check or control exercised by the Treasury over the expenditure of the offices immediately subject to it, and more particularly of the Board of Works. Indeed, as a check in these matters, the Treasury seemed of very little use. He thought that it would be extremely improper to proceed with the Estimates in so thin a House, and moved that the House be counted.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members not being present,

MR. SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at half after Seven o'clock, till Monday next.

THE REGIUS PROFESSORSHIP AT OXFORD.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DERBY:—My Lords, when a charge has been made in your Lordships' House affecting an individual or a public body, your Lordships are always willing to afford an opportunity of explanation. If it be true that the greater the authority from which the attack proceeds the greater is the injury done, I feel certain that I need not further apologize for adverting to a statement which was made in this House, by no less an authority than the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, with reference to a breach of faith alleged to have been committed by the University with which I have the honour of being closely connected—the University of Oxford. I am quite aware, and the University gratefully acknowledges, that the noble and learned Lord has been, on all occasions, actuated by the kindest feeling towards the University, and they recognize this feeling in the effort he has made to provide for the endowment of the Regius Professorship of Greek, and thus relieving the University from an embarrassing difficulty. For that reason I the more regret that the noble and learned Lord should have let fall expressions which went further than the impression he intended to convey, and which were certainly highly disparaging to the University of Oxford. The noble and learned Lord's words were—

“The best mode would undoubtedly be for the University to do that which justice and reason pointed out, and which, in fact, good faith demanded, for the University had received great gifts from the Crown, with the understanding that the duty of endowing public Professorships should be fulfilled on their part.”

On the second reading of the Bill, the noble and learned Lord is reported to have said—

“The University of Oxford had received certain pecuniary exemptions on the understanding that it would make proper provision for its Professors. It had got an exemption from stamp duties on its degrees; it had got an exemption with regard to patent fees to the amount of £12,000 or £14,000 a year.”

Now the latter part of that paragraph is a manifest error, and upon referring to The Standard of the same date I find the following passage:—

“Their Lordships were aware that the University had received great pecuniary benefits on the understanding that they would make proper provision for the Professors. First of all, they enjoyed an exemption from stamp duties on degrees; the University was also exempted from the patent of the Queen's Printer—a benefit amounting in value, he was informed, to £12,000 or £14,000 a year.”

I think the noble and learned Lord is mistaken as to the amount, though there is no doubt that the privilege of being exempt from the patent of the Queen's Printer has been very valuable. The question is whether the grants which have been made to the University have been made on the understanding or for the purpose of empowering the University to endow Professorships and pay salaries. I may remind the House that it is only within a comparatively recent period that the professorial system has come into actual operation. When I was an undergraduate, although there were Professors for various branches of education, the whole business of the University was carried on by the tutorial and not by the professorial system, and I will undertake to say that at that time not one undergraduate out of a hundred was aware of the existence of a Greek or Latin Professor. I do not deny that the Universities have accepted great emolument from the Crown; but what I complain of is that they have been charged with not fulfilling the engagement or understanding upon which they accepted that emolument. The noble and learned Lord certainly gave an explanation which could not be offensive to the University; but certainly it was not the impression made on your Lordships and on the public; and in order to show the impression produced elsewhere, I will, with your Lordships' permission, quote an extract from an article which appeared in The Times—

“It is scarcely sufficiently remembered in discussing the question that the University is actually bound as a mere matter of good faith, as it has been put by the Lord Chancellor without contradiction, to provide the endowment for this Regius Professorship. The Crown some few years ago abandoned stamp duties on giving degrees and other occasions to the amount of more than £12,000 a year, and the reduction was made on the clear understanding that the University would undertake the endowment of the Regius Professorships still insufficiently paid.

The Crown, in point of fact, has given the University a large sum of money on the understanding that a portion of it shall be applied to this purpose; and to refuse to supply it is, to say the least of it, a breach of faith.”

I do not complain of this article, provided the facts are correctly set forth; but I deny that they are correctly stated, and with your Lordships' permission, I will proceed for a very few moments to point out how the case actually stands, and what are the engagements which were entered into by the Universities in consequence of the endowments from the Crown. The exemption was originally made in the time of Charles I., and has continued ever since in both the Universities. Up to this hour, however, I have never understood that the grant was made subject to any obligation for the endowment of any Professorship whatever. That disposes of the largest part of the charge of the noble and learned Lord. By confounding two things, the noble and learned Lord has given a colour to the charge—that, inasmuch as the University has not endowed a certain

Professorship, therefore they are liable to the imputation of breach of faith, because in the cases of other endowments where there has been a distinct engagement, that engagement has been acted upon. The facts as to the remission of the tax upon matriculations and degrees are these. In 1815, when every possible subject for taxation was eagerly sought after, a stamp duty was for the first time imposed upon matriculations and degrees. After enduring for forty years, the tax was remitted in 1854, upon the recommendation of the University Commissioners. The tax only produced about £2,400 a year, and it was then remitted. But there was a great difference between presenting to the University a sum of £2,400 a year, and simply taking off a tax with which the University had been burdened for forty years. This remission of taxation has been put forward as a gift to the University, in consequence of which that body undertook to perform certain engagements. It is quite true that when that tax was taken off, the University did accept certain conditions, and did consent to be charged again with certain fees. The University was to pay certain sums to certain Professors. Those sums were originally charged upon the Civil List, but were subsequently placed in the annual Votes made by Parliament. The total sum voted by Parliament for those Professors was £953 a year. The first act of the University after the remission of the stamp duty, was to make a corresponding reduction in the amount of fees payable upon matriculations and degrees, thus deriving for itself no benefit from the remission of the tax. But the University also undertook the duty of providing the £953 a year to the Professors, and in the Act of Parliament passed in 1854, it was provided that the stamp duties should be remitted as soon as due provision had been made for the payment of the Professors of the University. That was a distinct obligation, subject to which the stamp duty was given up. The University in fulfilment of that obligation, has, in addition to the £953 which it undertook to provide, actually paid to the Professors a sum of £1,250 a year, thus more than doubling the contribution they had undertaken to make. The University has also endowed other Professorships to the extent of £1,750 a year. We have the clearest evidence, that of Parliament, that the University has fulfilled the obligation which it took upon itself. In the preamble to the Act of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 36 it is declared—

“And whereas by a statute of the said University adopted by Convocation the 31st day of May, 1855, provision has been made for the payment out of the University chest, of the salaries and allowances to certain Professors of the said University, mentioned in the schedule to this Act (being the same salaries and allowances as were heretofore annually voted by Parliament to the same Professors), and the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are satisfied that such statute is a due provision in lieu of the moneys heretofore voted annually by Parliament, as intended by the said Act; be it enacted,” &c.

I think I have shown your Lordships that there was no understanding, engagement, or condition as to the endowment of this, that, or the other Professorship—that there was never any obligation, except the generally implied obligation of supplying a University education. I have shown that when the stamp duty was remitted, the duty which the University took upon itself has been more than fulfilled. It is, therefore, hard upon the University that the noble and learned Lord, with his high position and great authority, should have used expressions—stronger, perhaps, than he intended, but which conveyed a wrong impression to the House, and to the public through the columns of the newspapers, and especially of that journal which I believe has a wider circulation than any other in the world; and this has given to The Times ground for introducing into a leading article a specific charge against the University of having received money upon the promise of performing certain acts, which acts they have not performed. If such a charge could be substantiated, I should not be so proud as I am now of my connection with that University; but I think your Lordships will agree that the statement I have made relieves that body of an imputation of bad faith which, coming from so important a source, could not fail to produce a very bad impression upon the public mind.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I would be the last person to desire to bring any charge against the University of Oxford. Even if a charge were well founded, I would rather cast a veil over the offence than expose it to the public view. I am sorry that the noble Earl has entered into this matter at such length, because it might have been sufficient to have withdrawn the words attributed to me—I cannot tell why or wherefore—as imputing to the University of Oxford that they had violated a distinct understanding. I certainly did not use any such words. It is difficult to rely upon words spoken in debate; but, subject to correction of the noble Earl's recollection and the reports in the newspapers, I may say that it never entered into my mind that in respect to any of the gifts to the University there had been anything like a distinct understanding or compact with the Government or with Parliament. But if the noble Earl means to put it that because there was no understanding therefore there was no obligation, I must take the liberty of saying that a greater error cannot exist. The understanding in these matters would be the obligation to do that which it is the duty of the University to do. I speak upon this matter with some anxiety, and desire, if possible, to speak with the same care as though I were speaking from the bench of the Court of Chancery. The nature of the obligation, and the manner in which it has been carried out by the University, can be gathered from the statement of the noble Earl. The University has fulfilled its duty by endowing every Professorship but one—the Professorship of Greek. Has the University recognized no duty in making those endowments? Has the University any justification for not endowing that Professorship? and, if so, on what does that justification rest? Is it a right thing to have a Professor performing his duties in an eminently satisfactory manner, and yet to endeavour to starve him out of the University? Is it a becoming thing in the University to say we will punish you for your heterodoxy by refusing you a just remuneration for your labour? Is it a becoming thing in the University to take advantage of the labours of a Professor in instructing the youth committed to its care, and be obliged to acknowledge that those labours are performed in a manner unexampled for industry, care, and success, and yet to refuse him the common rewards of his toil? Now, let me show your Lordships what is the nature of the obligation into which the University has entered. The noble Earl has stated quite correctly, that the original gift to the University was by patent enabling them to print every description of book, and that this has been considered by courts of justice to operate as an exception to the patent of the Queen's Printer, and to give the University the power of printing the Bible and Prayer Book. By the law as it now stands for the general security of the commonwealth and for the security of religion, what I may denominate the copyright of the Old and New Testament is vested in the Crown. The Crown is in the habit of granting it to the Queen's Printer; but in the time of Elizabeth a grant was made to the University of the right of printing and publishing every description of book. I think the words used are, omni-modum librum. A Question subsequently arose between the Queen's Printer and the University of Cambridge, as to whether the antecedent patent to the University was overruled by the patent of the Queen's Printer, and there was a remarkable letter in the first volume of Burns' Ecclesiastical Law from Mr. Justice Foster, one of the Justices of the King's Bench, to Sir William Blackstone, who was then Vinerian Professor of Common Law at Oxford, in which he explained the reason of the decision then given. He says—

"I thought it would be agreeable to you to know the issue of the cause. The word 'intrusted' was inserted by way of intimation to the University, that we consider the power given by the letters patent as a trust reposed in that learned body for public benefit, for the advancement of literature, and not to be transferred upon lucrative views to other hands."

Now, if the University has received what the noble Earl states to be £12,000 a year—

THE EARL OF DERBY: I said, on the contrary, that the amount had been exaggerated.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I beg pardon. I do not mean to fasten anything on the noble Earl; but the amount is generally supposed to be £12,000. But we will take it at £10,000. If the University has received £10,000 a year for the advancement of literature upon trust for the public benefit, and refuses to remunerate the labours of a Professor in order to starve him out of his heterodoxy, as it is called—that heterodoxy not at all interfering with his appointment—is it to be said that injustice has been done to a public body acting thus? I grieve to say so—because it was stated that what it had done was inconsistent with good faith, with justice, and with reason. Now, let us examine this a little. If you violate a trust, do you act with good faith? Will the noble Earl give an answer to that question? If the trust which attaches itself to all these benefits be violated, has the University preserved good faith? Are we to have the University vindicated on the special plea that there was no understanding?

If I receive money for performing a duty and say nothing, am I exempted from duty on the special plea that there was no understanding? Is that the language, feeling, and conduct of a man of honour? Is this the ethical lesson to be taught by the University charged with the duty of educating and instructing the youth of England? Is that to be the doctrine held up for the sanction of this House, the great court of appeal of the nation? I am sorry the defence of the University rests on no better ground. There is an old proverb that we should abstain from stirring up quod non bene olet. I wish the University had thought of this before they came here with such a defence. There is no greater duty of the University than that they should so conduct themselves as to impress those who come to them for instruction with a sense of their justice and their earnest desire to reward the instructors of youth. There is not a single Professor who is not endowed except this. There is not one who has so great a claim. And yet what does the University do? It drives young men in crowds to the chambers of this Professor, who are all most deservedly attached to him, and one of the greatest bonds of union between them is the sense of injustice with which he has been treated by the University. Is that consistent with reason? Let me for one moment call your attention to the manner in which this matter was put to the University itself. I have here an argument used before it, and with your Lordships' permission I will adopt a few words of it as a portion of my answer to the noble Earl. "But if we are told," says the speaker, "that a person who takes an office, ill paid (or rather not paid at all), yet having attached to it great, useful, and important functions (as a Professorship of Greek in this University has, for it is a disgrace and a blot on the University that it has never yet had a properly endowed chair of Greek); if we are told that such a person undertaking and discharging those functions and doing us thereby great, useful, and important services, doing for the University that which is really necessary should be done, has no claim on us whatever—if that is justice, I say that it is a kind of justice which may do for an attorney's office perhaps, or for a Government Department, but which is so narrow, so technical, I must add so ungenerous, that any man would be ashamed to act on it in private life, and I hope we should be ashamed to insist upon it here." And that is good faith. You would be ashamed to refuse a man the reward for his labour, and take shelter in this, that you had employed him, but there was no understanding between you. That is what the University has done. Now, I leave the issue to your Lordships. But of this I am confident, that we do no injustice to the University in holding it up in its proper colours; because I am sure there are within and without the University faithful and devoted sons, who will see her rescued from this reproach. The noble Earl will permit one word more, and that is, to do an act of ordinary justice. When I brought forward this measure, let me assure you, I had no communication whatever with the Professor of Greek. I go farther—when that learned gentleman saw the Bill after it was brought in he wrote, through the medium of a friend, to me; and said, "I do not desire that this measure should be prosecuted. I would rather trust the University. I am content to go on labouring as I now labour; and I will trust to the University doing me justice in the end." The right rev. Bench will tell me whether that is not language conceived in a more Christian spirit than the proceedings on the part of the University. I am happy to add this remark to the unanimous testimony which is borne to the excellence of the learned Gentleman. I have thought it right to mention this, in order that your Lordships should not suppose that a measure, intended for the good of the University, had been brought forward on the authority, or with the sanction and for the benefit of that individual Professor.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I did not state that the measure was not introduced for the advantage of the University. I did not enter into the question how far it was desirable that the University should make a grant to the present Professor of Greek. I only said it was quite sufficiently known on what grounds they had, whether wisely or not, decided. But what I did complain of was the statement made by the noble and learned Lord; and though he says he did not make use of the expression, it is singular that, in the reports of two successive debates, papers not at all connected with each other should have attributed it to the noble and learned Lord—namely, that there had been a distinct understanding on this subject, which had been violated by the University.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: If I made use of the words I decidedly withdraw them.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I am quite satisfied now that the noble and learned Lord has withdrawn the words as publicly as he made the charge. I only regret that he should have taken the occasion of the University wishing to protect themselves against what they felt to be a most unjust imputation, to make a fresh attack, and by implication repeating the charge which he in so many words repudiated. I cannot help thinking that the noble and learned Lord would have done better if he had frankly stated that he had not charged the University with any violation of an engagement or understanding.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl will pardon me for a moment. I distinctly charged the University with a violation of trust, but I certainly did not use the word "understanding."

THE EARL OF DERBY: With all respect, I must say that the noble and learned Lord has failed to show that the University has been guilty of any violation of trust. The words which the noble and learned Lord read to the House specified what was the kind of trust in question, and then the noble and learned Lord assumed, that because for particular reasons a certain Professorship has not been endowed, therefore the University has violated the general conditions of that trust, which referred to the promotion of literature and science, and the education of the young men committed to its care. I say the trust was so general in its terms, and the University has carried out its conditions so fully and literally, that the University ought to have been free from the censure which the noble and learned Lord has thought himself justified in passing upon it while professing to withdraw words which have naturally given great dissatisfaction, and which have led to representations in the public press that I hope the present conversation will satisfy the country at large were unfounded, and that certainly exaggerated even the view expressed by the noble and learned Lord, and, still more, I am willing to believe the real opinion entertained by him.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I entirely dissent from the rebuke which the

noble Earl has thought fit to bestow upon the noble and learned Lord on the Wool-sack. In the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Lord, that the obligations of justice have not been fulfilled by the University, I am sure most of your Lordships will concur. I think that this debate will lead to some practical benefit. My noble and learned Friend brought forward a measure which your Lordships have decided to postpone; but I am glad to perceive that the debates which took place upon it have encouraged the University authorities to make a further attempt, which I hope will be successful, to do a mere act of justice to a very learned and eminent man, the present Professor of Greek. How does the case stand? Here is a distinguished Greek scholar, teaching, with singular energy and industry, and in a manner peculiar to himself, nearly all the ablest young men at the University; and while other Professorships are largely endowed—some with £600 a year, some with £900, and some even with £1,000—none with less than £300 a year, the amount of the remuneration granted to the Professor of Greek does not exceed £40 per annum. Several efforts have been made to increase that remuneration, and have been supported by the great majority of the teaching and intellectual residents at the University; but, nevertheless, up to the present moment, they have been unsuccessful. What are the reasons urged—most conscientiously, no doubt—by the majority of the University against increasing the endowment of the Greek Professorship? One is that Professor Jowett is supposed to hold certain opinions on doctrinal matters which are not the opinions of the majority of the Oxford constituency. It appears to me that, as a matter of policy, it would be advisable for the University to hold itself neutral in these discussions on doctrinal points; but, apart from that, I cannot help thinking that the line adopted by the University is the most inconvenient and illogical that any learned body could assume. In the first place the University has not exercised the powers which it has of depriving Professor Jowett of the degrees which alone enable him to teach Greek; and, in the next place, not a single head of a College has ventured to prohibit any of his students from regularly attending the lectures of a man whose influence has naturally been increased by the students rightly thinking that he has been subjected to an unjust persecution. The University, while not prohibiting its students from receiving anything baneful which Professor Jowett may be thought capable of imparting to them, and while enjoying the great advantage of having its ablest young men taught in the best possible manner a critical knowledge of Greek, tries, forsooth, to save its conscience by refusing a modest remuneration to the Professor. It appears to me impossible to stand upon that plea. There is another reason, which seems at first sight much more plausible; it is that the Greek Professor being nominated by the Crown, it is the business of the Crown, and not of the University, to find funds for his remuneration. That plea also cannot hold water. There are other Professorships which, if not wholly, are partially endowed by the University, and the endowments of which have been recently increased by the University; and yet the Professors are nominated by the Crown. Besides, I utterly dissent from the principle that the right of nomination or of election should necessarily, and, under all circumstances, rest with whoever supplies the endowment. In considering this question as between the Crown and the University I think the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was justified in pointing to some of the pecuniary advantages which have recently been conferred upon the latter. I am not sure of the amount derived by the University from the privilege of printing the Bible and Prayer Book, but I know that in 1852 the average sum was about £11,000, and I should be surprised to hear that it is less in 1864. A considerable sum—£500 a year—was also granted to the University by the State as compensation for the abandonment of the monopoly of printing the Almanacs, and your Lordships will recollect that the University has been relieved when purchasing land from the provisions of the Mortmain Act. Within a comparatively short period, in fact, a large addition has been made to the income of the University.

EARL GRANVILLE: And that amounted to £2,400 a year; and when it was remitted it improved the income of the University by that amount. When it was made, the endowment of the Professorships was in contemplation, and I cannot help thinking that at a time when the University was increasing the endowment of Professorships it should not have entirely passed over one of the most successful, most eminent, and most deserving of its Professors. I should be sorry to say anything that might irritate or offend, and I have made these observations, not with any wish to wound the feelings of any man, but because I think they relate to matters that ought to be taken into consideration when this subject is next discussed at Oxford itself. The feeling of your Lordships undoubtedly is that the Greek Professorship should be properly endowed, and one of the reasons which induced a majority of your number to vote against the Bill of my noble and learned Friend was that it was clearly the duty of the University itself to provide the requisite funds. I trust that deliberately expressed opinion of your Lordships will have its due weight at Oxford and elsewhere.

COUNTY COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 70.)

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>.—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD BROUGHAM said, he was glad that in this country we had to discuss only the question of the County Courts, at a time when, in almost every other part of the world, affairs were in so unsatisfactory, not to say deplorable, a state. In the New World, a portentous indifference to human life and public credit; in the Old a frightful triumph of cruelty, fraud, and pillage, by the strong against the weak—a triumph at once inglorious and disgraceful. In regard to the measure before them, it could not be overlooked that there was an almost unanimous opinion on the part of the County Court Judges against the Bill. Of sixty of these Judges who had considered and given their opinions upon it, not less than fifty-eight were clearly and decidedly opposed to it, or at least to one of the most important parts—that with reference to imprisonment for debt. There was, it seemed to him, some misapprehension as to the proportion of judgment summonses. In the course of the year, 900,000 complaints were brought in the County Courts, of which, not above 9,000 ended in judgment summonses, or, in other words, not 1 per cent of the whole number. Moreover, of these judgment summonses—which were not committals, but possibilities of committals—a very small proportion resulted in actual committals. This was a smaller proportion than in the superior courts—the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer—where the proportion of writs of fi. fa. to actions brought was 8 per cent. There were some provisions of the Bill of which he highly approved—for instance, those clauses which gave to these Courts an equitable jurisdiction. He had himself endeavoured to procure an extension of equitable jurisdiction to the County Courts, but had not succeeded, for neither of his Bills on that subject in 1851 and 1852 had been passed. He trusted, however, that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack might be more successful in that respect. He thought, however, that if the Legislature should give their sanction to the proposition it would be necessary to increase the number of Judges, as the present staff would scarcely be able to overtake the additional labour. Another proposition of the Bill was that with respect to the limitation of actions. No doubt the present period was too long; but he thought that it would be inexpedient to restrict the period within which a small debt was recoverable to one year, and that two years would be a preferable limit. He thought it desirable that there should be some provision imposing some check in regard to summonses, which ought not to be issued as a matter of course; but that was a detail which could be considered afterwards. The optional clause of the existing Act as to bringing suits for sums above £50 in the County Courts had proved ineffective. He thought a better plan would be to give the power to bring the suit, and to leave it to the other party to object to its being tried in the lower Court. On the whole, he approved of the Bill, except the provision as to commitment for debt, and hoped his noble and learned Friend would be able to pass it.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he could not support the Bill as it now stood. The Bill proposed to reduce the time under which small debts should be recoverable to one year. The matter was of very great social importance though it lay in a very small compass. By the law as it now stood if a man contracted a debt by simple contract, or acknowledged an existing debt and promised to pay it, or paid a sum on account of it, he could be sued for it any time within six years. But by the Bill of the noble and learned Lord this period as regarded debts under £20, would be limited to one year. He could see no reason for so great a reduction. He thought the very shortest limitation should be three years. This was a question of very great importance to the working classes, for credit was their capital. Speaking generally the classes of persons sued in the county courts were manufacturing and agricultural labourers; and if they took away credit they practically took away the only capital these poor men had. Most of them had scarcely any money, and lived in lodgings; and the furniture they had was so small that the bailiff who was sent to execute the summons did not think it worth while to take the chattels, as he knew there would be no return beyond the expense of the execution. More injury would be done in carrying out such an execution than if the person were to be taken. Suppose the goods of a labourer were worth £10; they would not in a forced sale bring more than 10s., and the poor labourer without furniture would find it hard to recover his position. Let their Lordships consider the case of the ordinary agricultural labourer. He might earn in summer 12s. or 14s. a week, and so long as he could earn his wages he got along very well. But in the severe winter the farmer declined his labourer's services. What was he then to do? As he had no money, and this Bill would destroy his chance of obtaining credit with the small shopkeeper, he must go to the workhouse. At present he went to the grocer or the baker with whom he had dealt in summer, and whom he had paid when in receipt of wages; and the grocer or baker, knowing that if he did not give him credit in winter, he could not have his custom in summer, supplied him with goods. But by this Bill he could not give this credit with safety. The existing law worked well both for the shopkeeper and the labourer, and he trusted their Lordships would do nothing to destroy the credit given to the working man. Again, the sympathies of their Lordships ought not to be solely with the debtor; the creditor, the small shopkeeper with a small capital, was entitled to a share of them. The small shopkeeper ought to have the power of enforcing his demands. The amount of debts represented by the 900,000 plaintiffs which were issued out of these Courts represented a large sum of money. At present the County Court Judge, after ascertaining that the debtor was unable to pay his debt by instalment, or directing him to do so, and if the debtor then made a default in the payment of the instalments a judgment summons issued, and the debtor might be committed to prison. Imprisonment sometimes took place more than once for the same debt, and he was of opinion that in this respect the law might well be corrected; but the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack desired to do away entirely with the power of imprisonment, except for fraud, false pretences, and acts of that description; and the imprisonment for such offences the noble and learned Lord extended to two months, in lieu of the forty days, which the law at present allowed as the maximum term. As the law at present stood, if a man had means to pay a debt and would not pay it he might be sent to prison; but the Bill before the House proposed to take away the power of sending to prison altogether except in cases of fraud. And then there was this extraordinary provision in the Bill, that a judgment debtor might be punished if he wilfully wasted his income or earnings by unjustifiable extravagance or conduct. So that the creditor would have to prove that the judgment debtor had wilfully wasted his income in that way, and, therefore, he would have to follow the debtor about in order to find out how he spent his time. But, supposing the debtor was not guilty of this wasteful extravagance, then he could not be compelled to pay. He might have the means, he might have the money in his pocket, and yet refuse to pay, and in that case he could not be sent to prison. There was one portion of this Bill which, when it became known, would certainly excite general opposition, and that was that as soon as there was a judgment the Judge should have power to make an order, directed to the employer, commanding him to appropriate a certain portion of the wages of the debtor, and to pay them to the bailiff towards the liquidation of the debt. But was such a provision to be carried into effect? Suppose that there were a million of suits in the Courts throughout England, and that in a large proportion of them orders of this kind were made upon employers—how could they give effect to those orders? At a public meeting a manufacturer had recently stated that he employed 2,500 persons. Let their Lordships imagine a manufacturer of this magnitude whose workpeople were remiss in paying their debts. He would be constantly served with notices to appropriate portions of his workmen's wages towards the payment of their debts—how would he be able to carry on his business? The noble and learned Lord would find it impossible to carry the clause into effect. But let this clause be struck out, and there would be no provision in the Bill for compelling a labouring man to pay his debts. He might be punished for fraud, but that was the case under the present law. A person of no means was not committed under the law as it now stood, but if he had means he was compelled to pay, and if he had no goods that could be come at he had to answer in his person. A man might have incurred a debt very lightly and very willingly; well, then, let him pay like an honest man, as willingly as he had incurred the debt. This Bill was one which would have as wide an operation as it was possible to conceive, and, if passed into law, it might fairly be called a Bill for stopping the credit of the labouring classes. The Bill had been called one in favour of the labouring classes, but as it stood it would exonerate not only the labouring classes, but everybody else from the payment of debts under £20 after the lapse of a year; and this without any of those safeguards which should appertain to a statute of limitations. Referring to the Return made by the County Court Judges, it would appear that the Bill dealt with public-house debts, but not with some other kinds of debts which those Judges referred to. They said that there was an extensive system of selling goods, chiefly wearing apparel, by travelling packmen, upon the terms of paying 1s. 6d. or some other small sum a month; and that these sales were almost always made without the knowledge of the husband. Such creditors obtained judgments in large numbers; and in the great majority of cases no defendant appeared, so that the Judge was obliged to make orders of commitment. The Judges also drew attention to a system of sales by auction in some counties in Wales, the intending purchasers being largely supplied with beer, and third parties being sureties for payment. These cases produced many judgment summonses; and, indeed, the County Courts were used to collect the debts of such persons. He desired also to say that in his opinion it would be most objectionable to transfer to the County Courts the powers of the Courts of Equity, and, indeed, that a greater curse could not be inflicted upon the country. When a man possessed of distinct understanding on this subject, which had been violated by the University.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: If I made use of the words I decidedly withdraw them.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I am quite satisfied now that the noble and learned Lord has withdrawn the words as publicly as he made the charge. I only regret that he should have taken the occasion of the University wishing to protect themselves against what they felt to be a most unjust imputation, to make a fresh attack, and by implication repeating the charge which he in so many words repudiated. I cannot help thinking that the noble and learned Lord would have done better if he had frankly stated that he had not charged the University with any violation of an engagement or understanding.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl will pardon me for a moment. I distinctly charged the University with a violation of trust, but I certainly did not use the word "understanding."

THE EARL OF DERBY: With all respect, I must say that the noble and learned Lord has failed to show that the University has been guilty of any violation of trust. The words which the noble and learned Lord read to the House specified what was the kind of trust in question, and then the noble and learned Lord assumed, that because for particular reasons a certain Professorship has not been endowed, therefore the University has violated the general conditions of that trust, which referred to the promotion of literature and science, and the education of the young men committed to its care. I say the trust was so general in its terms, and the University has carried out its conditions so fully and literally, that the University ought to have been free from the censure which the noble and learned Lord has thought himself justified in passing upon it while professing to withdraw words which have naturally given great dissatisfaction, and which have led to representations in the public press that I hope the present conversation will satisfy the country at large were unfounded, and that certainly exaggerated even the view expressed by the noble and learned Lord, and, still more, I am willing to believe the real opinion entertained by him.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I entirely dissent from the rebuke which the

noble Earl has thought fit to bestow upon the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. In the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Lord, that the obligations of justice have not been fulfilled by the University, I am sure most of your Lordships will concur. I think that this debate will lead to some practical benefit. My noble and learned Friend brought forward a measure which your Lordships have decided to postpone; but I am glad to perceive that the debates which took place upon it have encouraged the University authorities to make a further attempt, which I hope will be successful, to do a mere act of justice to a very learned and eminent man, the present Professor of Greek. How does the case stand? Here is a distinguished Greek scholar, teaching, with singular energy and industry, and in a manner peculiar to himself, nearly all the ablest young men at the University; and while other Professorships are largely endowed—some with £600 a year, some with £900, and some even with £1,000—none with less than £300 a year, the amount of the remuneration granted to the Professor of Greek does not exceed £40 per annum. Several efforts have been made to increase that remuneration, and have been supported by the great majority of the teaching and intellectual residents at the University; but, nevertheless, up to the present moment, they have been unsuccessful. What are the reasons urged—most conscientiously, no doubt—by the majority of the University against increasing the endowment of the Greek Professorship? One is that Professor Jowett is supposed to hold certain opinions on doctrinal matters which are not the opinions of the majority of the Oxford constituency. It appears to me that, as a matter of policy, it would be advisable for the University to hold itself neutral in these discussions on doctrinal points; but, apart from that, I cannot help thinking that the line adopted by the University is the most inconvenient and illogical that any learned body could assume. In the first place the University has not exercised the powers which it has of depriving Professor Jowett of the degrees which alone enable him to teach Greek; and, in the next place, not a single head of a College has ventured to prohibit any of his students from regularly attending the lectures of a man whose influence has naturally been increased by the students rightly thinking that he has been subjected to an unjust persecution. The University, while not prohibiting its students from receiving anything baneful which Professor Jowett may be thought capable of imparting to them, and while enjoying the great advantage of having its ablest young men taught in the best possible manner a critical knowledge of Greek, tries, forsooth, to save its conscience by refusing a modest remuneration to the Professor. It appears to me impossible to stand upon that plea. There is another reason, which seems at first sight much more plausible; it is that the Greek Professor being nominated by the Crown, it is the business of the Crown, and not of the University, to find funds for his remuneration. That plea also cannot hold water. There are other Professorships which, if not wholly, are partially endowed by the University, and the endowments of which have been recently increased by the University; and yet the Professors are nominated by the Crown. Besides, I utterly dissent from the principle that the right of nomination or of election should necessarily, and, under all circumstances, rest with whoever supplies the endowment. In considering this question as between the Crown and the University I think the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was justified in pointing to some of the pecuniary advantages which have recently been conferred upon the latter. I am not sure of the amount derived by the University from the privilege of printing the Bible and Prayer Book, but I know that in 1852 the average sum was about £11,000, and I should be surprised to hear that it is less in 1864. A considerable sum—£500 a year—was also granted to the University by the State as compensation for the abandonment of the monopoly of printing the Almanacs, and your Lordships will recollect that the University has been relieved when purchasing land from the provisions of the Mortmain Act. Within a comparatively short period, in fact, a large addition has been made to the income of the University.

EARL GRANVILLE: And that amounted to £2,400 a year; and when it was remitted it improved the income of the University by that amount. When it was made, the endowment of the Professorships was in contemplation, and I cannot help thinking that at a time when the University was increasing the endowment of Professorships it should not have entirely passed over one of the most successful, most eminent, and most deserving of its Professors. I should be sorry to say anything that might irritate or offend, and I have made these observations, not with any wish to wound the feelings of any man, but because I think they relate to matters that ought to be taken into consideration when this subject is next discussed at Oxford itself. The feeling of your Lordships undoubtedly is that the Greek Professorship should be properly endowed, and one of the reasons which induced a majority of your number to vote against the Bill of my noble and learned Friend was that it was clearly the duty of the University itself to provide the requisite funds. I trust that deliberately expressed opinion of your Lordships will have its due weight at Oxford and elsewhere.

He desired also to say that in his opinion it would be most objectionable to transfer to the County Courts the powers of the Courts of Equity, and, indeed, that a greater curse could not be inflicted upon the country. When a man possessed of small property died, the course was now for the parties interested to come to some arrangement and dispose of their claims amicably; but if this Bill passed, each such case would give rise to an equitable suit in the County Court, and the whole country would soon be overrun with litigation. Beyond this power of appeal was given from these new Equity Courts to the original Court of Equity. For the reasons which he had stated he thought that there were many objections to the measure which was then before their Lordships.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the noble and learned Lord in introducing the Bill, had stated very fairly that the subject was of great interest and importance to the people, relating, as it did, to the law of debtor and creditor, and its administration as it affected the humbler classes of society. He was most anxious that the question involved in the Bill should not be regarded simply as one of a legal character. It was a social question of the highest importance, and one which involved not only the welfare of the labouring classes, but their independence of character and integrity, and uprightness of dealing. It was a question, moreover, which appeared to him to require the most cautious deliberation, for it was one round which it was very easy to raise a mist of prejudice, through which things would be viewed in a false light. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack must forgive him for saying that in the able speech with which he introduced the Bill he permitted their Lordships to see only one side of the case. It would be his humble task to endeavour to call attention to other considerations which were necessary to do complete justice to the subject. The Bill of his noble and learned Friend might be divided into two general heads. First, the mode of enforcing payment of debts in County Courts; and second, conferring upon those Courts an equitable jurisdiction. As to the latter object, he had no objection to it in principle, and, therefore, he should confine all he had to say at present to the former—and certainly the most important portion of the Bill. The principal feature of this portion might be described to be a proposal to take away from the Judges of County Courts the power they now possessed of imprisoning for a limited time persons of ability to pay the amount imposed by judgment of the Court, and who neglected or refused to do so. It was important that their Lordships should bear in mind the circumstances under which this power originated. Prior to 1844 there were numerous Courts of Request for the recovery of small debts, which all possessed the power of enforcing their judgment by imprisonment. In 1844 the Legislature thought it expedient to abolish arrest upon final process for debts under the amount of £20. But the mischievous consequences of this enactment both to debtor and creditor were soon discovered, and the very next year the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127 was passed, giving to the Small Debts Courts the power of imprisonment, which has since been exercised by the County Courts. In 1846 County Courts were established, and from that time to the present the power of commitment which it was now proposed to interfere with had been exercised by them. In 1853 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the working of these Courts; in their Report made in 1855, they recommended certain alterations, but carefully abstained from suggesting the removal of this power from the Judges. In consequence of a Return to the House of Commons of the number of persons imprisoned by the County Courts, the Treasury issued a circular in 1858 to the Judges of these Courts on the subject, and, as far as he remembered, they uniformly expressed their opinion as to the desirability of retaining the power of commitment. By an Act passed in 1859, the power of commitment was placed on the footing on which it now stands. The Legislature took away from the Judges the power of committing where defendants did not appear, except in cases of fraud, or where it appeared to the satisfaction of the Judge that the defendant had had, since the judgment, sufficient means to pay the instalments ordered by the Court, and had refused or neglected to pay them. He would call their attention to what had been said by one of the Judges—

“A great fact in reference to this question of imprisonment has been sadly overlooked by persons generally. No man is, or ought, at all events in accordance with the law, to be imprisoned simply because he has money and does not comply with the order of the Court, but because the Judge is satisfied by evidence that he is able to comply with the order and obstinately refuses so to do.”

In the month of March last a circular was sent to the County Court Judges by his noble and learned Friend, evidently with a view to this measure, asking their opinion as to the abolition or modification of the power of imprisonment. The result of that letter was, that the opinion of fifty-seven out of sixty was in favour of the retention of the power. He regarded that Return as being important, because it contained the opinions of men who, from their position, were brought into continual contact with the class of debtor and creditor, whose interests were affected by the Bill, and who had the largest experience on the subject. It did not appear to have been the intention of his noble and learned Friend to place the answers of the Judges to his circular upon the table, and they had only been obtained by the Motion of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth). These were the circumstances under which his noble and learned Friend introduced the present Bill. He could not help admiring the address with which his noble and learned Friend enlisted their Lordships' sympathies in favour of the Bill, by describing the misery to which the unhappy debtor was exposed under the system of imprisonment for debt now in practice. It was absolutely necessary, however, to put their Lordships upon their guard by describing the difference between the commitment by the County Court Judges and the old law of imprisonment for debt. The two things were perfectly distinct. By the old law, imprisonment for debt was the act of the creditor as a satisfaction for his debt, the power proposed to be affected by the Bill was the act of the Judge in consequence of disobedience to his order. Under the old law, imprisonment for debt was enforced whether the debtor had the means of paying or not; but in the County Court the power of commitment was only exercised where the debtor had the ability to pay, and refused to do so. The term of imprisonment, too, under the old law was indefinite, while the maximum term of commitment by the County Court was forty, and did not generally exceed seven or ten days. He did not know why his noble and learned Friend should have taken the Returns of the commitments for two years, unless it were for the purpose of having a greater range of figures, and so to produce a greater impression. He was certain that that statement had given rise to much misapprehension. His noble and learned Friend stated that in the two years ending December, 1863, no less than 17,797 persons were committed, and that the number of days' imprisonment to which they were sentenced was 309,777, and the number of days actually spent in prison was 253,860. He then assumed that on the average these persons earned 3*s.* a day each, and then multiplied the number of days spent in prison by that sum, and thus arrived at a sum of £43,434 as the value of the labour which was lost to the country to obtain the payment of £62,480. But there was a great fallacy in assuming that the persons committed were all in full work. As far as he (Lord Chelmsford) could make out, it very rarely happened that a man in full work was committed. The fact was that the debtor class was as easily recognizable as the criminal class, and it was not the honest hard working labouring man who was committed to prison, but the profligate idle man who worked only three days in the week and drank for the remainder. Nor was it fair to look at the absolute number of persons committed without noticing also the number of complaints out of which those commitments arose. According to his noble and learned Friend's statement, the number of commitments was about 9,000 per annum. But the number of complaints issued annually was upwards of 900,000, representing a sum of more than £2,000,000. Of these, more than half were settled before judgment; and there remained 400,000 judgments issued, representing a sum of about a million for debts and £40,000 for costs. In one-third of the cases in which commitments were ordered the debt was paid before the debtor was actually sent to prison, and therefore the 9,000 ought to be reduced to 6,000 as the number of persons actually sent to prison, which, upon 400,000 judgments, amounted to only  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The argument derived from the loss of labour to the public would apply equally to summary convictions, of which there were upwards of 113,000, and to imprisonments for assault, of which there were as many as 40,000 annually. With reference to the smallness of the proportion borne by the commitments to the complaints, the Judge of the Preston Court stated that in the Leeds district during six months ending April 30, 1862, out of 6,500 cases only 63 individuals were imprisoned, although 625 commitment summonses were taken out—nine-tenths of the debtors under the pressure of a commitment summons thus settling with their creditors. This was the benefit derived from the power of imprisonment; it was the imprisonment of one individual in a hundred which forced the majority of the remaining 99 to settle with their creditors. His noble and learned Friend referred to instances in which persons had been imprisoned for non-payment of very small sums, such as 3s., 2s., and, in one instance, 9d. But, in order that their Lordships might judge fairly of these cases, he ought to have informed them of the circumstances under which these commitments took place. They must bear in mind that the County Court Judges had the power of commitment only in cases where they were satisfied that the debtor had the ability to pay but refused to do so. He (Lord Chelmsford) had been made acquainted with two cases in which commitments might have been ordered for only 3d., but in which he was sure that every one of their Lordships would have approved the committal of the debtors. The first was the case of an attorney who was constantly in the habit of paying the clerk in the Registrar's office 6d. or 3d. short, and who was summoned for the latter amount. The other was a more remarkable case. An attorney's clerk who was summoned for the price of a bottle of whisky admitted that he had purchased and drank it, adding that it was very good, but set up as a defence the Tippling Act, passed in the reign of Geo. II. The Judge, pretending to have heard of this Act for the first time, looked at it very carefully, and then said, "I cannot order you to pay for the whisky, but, of course, you returned the bottle?" "No," said the defendant, "I did not." "Well, then," said the Judge, "I find nothing in the Act with regard to bottles, and therefore I shall award 3d. for the bottle, 7s. 6d. for the costs of the poor man whom you have compelled to attend here to-day, and 2s. 6d. for his witness." The attorney's clerk did not resist payment of the sums ordered, but if he had he was sure that not one of their Lordships would deny that he ought to have been sent to prison even for so small a sum as 3d. The fact was the smaller the sum the more reason there was for assuming that the debtor must have the means of paying it, and that therefore his imprisonment was due to his own obstinacy, and not to the oppressive character of the system. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) then went on to refer to instances in which there had been repeated commitments to prison for the same debt, and he said that a person might be committed fifty times for the same cause. Without dwelling upon the words "for the same cause," he ventured to ask his noble and learned Friend whether he knew of any instance in which a person had been committed not fifty times but five times for the same debt? In the papers which were before their Lordships, one of the Judges stated that out of 316 commitments in six months, only three were commitments for a second time; and another said that of 4,425 in six months, only about 300 were second commitments. Therefore, although it might be right that some modification should be introduced into the power of repeated imprisonment, they ought to be careful not to do anything even with regard to it which might create prejudice or excite any feeling upon a matter which required the most cautious and deliberate treatment. He did not think his noble and learned Friend had done justice to the County Court Judges. He would call their Lordships' attention to the mode in which his noble and learned Friend had availed himself of the opinions of some of those Judges, who would be astonished to find themselves enlisted in support of this measure. The noble and learned Lord quoted the opinion of Chief Justice Montague in 1551, and of Chief Justice Hyde in 1630, who in almost identical words declared that if a debtor had no goods he must live upon charity, and if no one would relieve him, let him die in the name of God. The noble and learned Lord referred to these statements to illustrate his declaration that Judges almost invariably looked upon these matters from a creditor's point of view. In the Return of Mr. Falconer those statements were to be found; but that gentleman did not quote them to prove the tendency of Judges to regard questions of imprisonment from a creditor's point of view, but to show how the efforts of the Legislature in modern times to prevent commitments were a strong contrast to the practice of ancient times. He therefore referred to these passages for a totally different purpose to that for which they were employed by the noble and learned Lord. The care and diligence shown by the County Court Judges had been admitted by the noble and learned Lord, but he imputed to them a partiality for retaining the powers of commitment conferred upon them by the existing law. That was hardly just towards the County Court Judges, whose answers showed that they were not at all enamoured of the powers which they now possessed. The Judges at Liverpool said that no part of their duty was so irksome, or caused them greater anxiety, than the dealing with judgment summonses. Another Judge said he would be delighted if he could be relieved of the disagreeable duty now imposed upon him; while others thought the abolition of the power of commitment would be a gain to the Judges, although it might not be beneficial to either creditors or debtors. The noble and learned Lord said that his object in introducing this Bill was to put an end to the present mischievous and dangerous facilities for obtaining credit by the labouring classes; and, in illustration of the evils of the present system, he read two passages from the answers of County Court Judges relating to tallymen and Scotch pedlars. After reading those passages the noble and learned Lord said that that was the nature of the cases which most frequently arise under the present law. He hoped his noble and learned Friend would not give the sanction of his high authority to an opinion that any liability could arise in such cases as those referred to. In one case credit was given to a daughter without the knowledge of her father and mother; and in the other case credit was given to a wife for useless finery without the knowledge of her husband. He ventured to say that any County Court Judge who committed a father or husband under such circumstances would not understand his duty, nor the law he was administering. The noble and learned Lord who had just spoken (Lord St. Leonards) seemed to consider that an alteration of the law was necessary with regard to such cases; but that was not so; and he ventured to state that the present law was sufficient to protect husbands and fathers under such circumstances. The chief force of the Bill, according to the noble and learned Lord, appeared to be to get rid of tallymen or itinerant drapers, who were supposed to be perpetually travelling about the country forcing their goods on people upon credit; and the noble and learned Lord reminded the House that in all villages there were small shopkeepers who gave credit. It was not, however, quite clear that something was not to be said for the tallymen. He (Lord Chelmsford) believed that in some places the visits of the tallyman were absolutely necessary to enable the wife and children of the labouring man to obtain decent and even necessary clothing; for in some of the retired rural districts wives could not leave their families to go to a distance to purchase apparel. He was also informed that County Court Judges almost invariably refused to make a husband liable for articles ordered by the wife unless they were of absolute necessity, and in the majority of cases the Judges refused to make a man liable unless his signature was to be found in the tallyman's book. The noble and learned Lord proposed to prevent credit being given to the labouring classes by taking away the power of commitment, he therefore admits that if that power did not exist credit would not be given. In other words, this power over him is the only security which he has to offer. If you propose this out of kindness to him, take care that you do not thereby visit him with a greater evil by preventing him from obtaining credit at times when it becomes an absolute necessity. What is he to do in times of sickness and slackness of work, when his family are ill, and a doctor is to be paid, or when death is in his house, and the undertaker is required, and mourning to be provided. What is to be done in cases of occupations where the labourer is not equally employed throughout the year, such as brickmakers who earn large wages in summer, and none in winter. What as to the large classes of labouring men who only received their wages at long intervals. In the case of miners, some receive their wages monthly, others once in two months. Were they not to obtain credit at a time when they had no means of paying ready money for the very necessities of life? They could not—or at least should not—prevent voluntary credit. If they did so they would pauperize not only debtors but also a large number of creditors, (small shopkeepers), and send them by scores and hundreds to the parish. To show what a narrow view had been taken of this great question, he must observe that every case had been treated as if it were a case of voluntary credit. But there were multitudes of cases where credit was involuntary. The petition he had presented from several societies for the Protection of Trade showed that the effect of the Bill would be to destroy the legitimate business of nearly every retail trader in the kingdom. One of the County Court Judges had furnished him with a description of the business which came before him in three days, and of 100 cases there were on one day twenty-nine, on another thirty-three, and on another thirty-four of involuntary credit. In all these cases if this Bill passed, the creditor would be deprived of the means of enfor-

ing his just demands. What was proposed to be substituted? First of all, there was to be the power of execution against goods beyond the value of £4. Then there was the power of arrestment of wages and punishment for fraud. With regard to the arrestment of wages, his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) had shown what difficulties would attend the measure. It seemed to be thought that the remedy by execution on the goods would not only be more merciful, but equally efficacious. Now, with regard to the compassionate view of the subject, he ventured to doubt whether it was not an infinitely less evil to a labouring man to suffer imprisonment for a short time than to have an execution put on his goods, which would probably be the ruin of his wife and family. He referred to the opinions given by the County Court Judges, one of whom, at page 41 of the printed papers, said that the remedy by execution against the goods, where the sole remedy given, was the most cruel, as well as the most inefficacious remedy. The goods seized would probably, under a forced sale, realize only a few shillings, while they could not be replaced for as many pounds. There was a very numerous class too who had no goods to seize and who would never pay their debts when sued for, however trifling they might be, unless under the pressure of the power of imprisonment. That pressure taken off, one-half of the judgments obtained in the County Courts would be worthless. The County Court, certainly a very expensive establishment, would then exist merely for the purpose of ascertaining, not of enforcing debts, and the sooner they were done away with the better for the country. With regard to the second section of the Bill—that which limited the time within which actions for sums under £20 could be brought—he admitted it would be desirable that a general measure should be introduced, not altering the law in regard to the Statute of Limitations, further than by abridging the period within which actions might be brought. But he did not see the ground on which a distinction was to be drawn between debts above and those under £20. There was no principle in it, for £20 to persons in the position of their Lordships was a very small sum, while to a labouring man it was a very large one. It surprised him to hear his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth), whose judgment was usually so sound, entertain the visionary idea that debts below a certain amount should be regarded as debts of honour. The limitation of one year would work injustice to creditors and operate harshly upon debtors. It would compel creditors who now forbear where the circumstances of the debtor call for forbearance to enforce payment for fear of losing the debt. If the clause passed, a medical man who now sent in his accounts yearly would be obliged not only to furnish them more frequently, but to press his debtor in the very cases where, from illness and want of employment, pressure would fall most injuriously upon him. While he admitted that it might be desirable to introduce an Amendment limiting the period for recovering small debts, he believed his noble and learned Friend, when he came to consider the point, would find that the limit proposed was inexpedient, and not practical. Another proposal, which was exceedingly plausible, but to which strong objections might likewise be urged, was that for taking away the concurrent jurisdiction of the superior courts in cases under £20. No doubt it was desirable to limit the costs of actions under £20; but in a variety of cases debts of £20 were incurred, not by labourers and mechanics to retail traders and tallymen, but by retail shopkeepers to wholesale merchants and warehousemen. These wholesale houses were, at present, enabled to sue out a writ in one of the superior courts, which was generally effective to produce payment. To take away in such instances the jurisdiction of the superior courts, and to compel the London, Glasgow, or Manchester merchant to send his travellers and books to these County Courts all over the country, would be a very serious hardship, and would, in many cases, amount to a denial of justice. The debtor, moreover, would have a direct inducement to carry the matter into the County Courts, as thereby he would obtain a little longer time, with the ultimate chance of being allowed to pay off the debt by instalments. The effect of passing such a measure would be to put a stop to, or at least to restrict credit to retail dealers under £20, being the amount of the larger proportion of book debts incurred to the wholesale houses, by which the honest and the dishonest would alike suffer. He was aware that he had trespassed at great length on their Lordships, but he scarcely felt that any apology was necessary for doing so, because the subject was one earnestly demanding their most careful consideration, and he was anxious that their attention should be directed to those points which seemed to him material in determining the propriety of the measure. It would be prudent, he thought, to withdraw from the Bill those clauses which proposed to take away from the County Court Judges the power of imprisonment, and to confine its operation to the introduction of equitable jurisdiction, in favour of which there was much to be said. Of course, he could not expect his noble and learned Friend, after taking so much pains with the measure, all at once to adopt that suggestion; but he trusted it would, nevertheless, engage his attention. To the second reading of the Bill he should offer no opposition; but its future progress required to be watched very narrowly, and the course he should feel it his duty to adopt would be governed by the declarations which the noble and learned Lord might feel it his duty to make.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he desired to present the proposition to their Lordships in its social bearing, the debate up to that moment having been conducted exclusively by noble and learned Lords. It was his conviction that to the agricultural districts no greater boon could be offered than the abolition of the pernicious system of credit by which they were at present weighed down; and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, if he relieved them from this great embarrassment, would entitle himself to their lasting gratitude. He therefore rejoiced that this Bill had been introduced, for it would cut at the root of an evil that was so mischievous. The system of large credits, moreover, was opposed to the spirit of modern legislation, which taught the working classes to hoard their earnings and invest their money to meet a time when their wages might be less. The noble and learned Lord who had just sat down (Lord Chelmsford) had talked about bricklayers and other labourers, whose work was principally in the summer, and asked what they were to do if they could not get credit in the winter. Why it was the credit system which was directly responsible for all the frauds practised on the poor, the rotten garments sold for them to wear, and the miserable food palmed off upon them to eat. They felt themselves dependent on the tradesmen, and went on running into debt with them to an amount greater than their circumstances warranted, under the belief that if they gave their creditors cause for offence they could be sent to prison. The present measure, if passed into law, would have the effect of delivering the agricultural districts from what he knew in practice to be one of the most odious tyrannies. In his belief the measure was calculated to prove highly beneficial, not only to the labouring classes, but to the community at large, for whom he thought a long retail credit of no advantage.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he approved the material features of the Bill, and especially of those clauses which limited in a great degree the power of imprisonment. In his opinion, there was a great fallacy in supposing there was an indispensable necessity for giving credit, at all events among the non-commercial classes. Credit, no doubt, was important in the mercantile world among those who had transactions abroad, among manufacturers, and among wholesale and even retail dealers; that is, among those who possess and those who employ capital; but what imaginable advantage was there in a system of credit among the poorer classes? The question was asked what the poor man was to do when he was out of employment. But the question really was whether it was desirable to encourage the working man to spend by anticipation wages which he had not yet earned, or to live upon that which he had put by for such an occasion. The former practice had been too much sanctioned by the operation of the County Courts, which, as at present constituted, had created a vicious system of credit among the poorer classes. It might be difficult to wean the labouring classes from the habit of living upon the anticipation of future wages, but legislation ought to be directed to this end. If the sole object of their legislation was to enable small traders to recover debts of £1 or £2, he did not believe that any means could be devised that would be half so effectual as the power of committal to prison. But in a social point of view it was better to go further back and consider whether these debts ought to be recoverable at all. He did not think that the clauses of this Bill were framed with the accuracy and clearness that generally belonged to his noble and learned Friend's measures. There was, however, nothing new in seizing property, because that could be done now. The Bill proposed to divide what a man had among his creditors, within certain limitations, and then to make the debtor as clear from future liability as if he had obtained a certificate in bankruptcy.

This was, he thought, the correct principle. It might work hardships at first, before the public got into the more wholesome system he had described; but that was an incident common to all salutary changes. He had not said that small debts ought to be regarded as debts of honour, but that they should be no more recoverable at law than debts of honour. Such a principle, if established, would, he believed, be for the advantage of society. Meanwhile he should give his cordial assent to the second reading of this Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he must express his regret that the discussion of so important a measure, involving a great social question on which every one of their Lordships was competent to form a most able and useful opinion, could not attract a greater assemblage of their Lordships than he saw around him. He could not but think that if their Lordships were habitually to neglect discussions of so much importance, it would be impossible that their House should retain the high position which it now held in public estimation. This Bill was intended to improve the position of the lower classes. He feared that the preceding legislation of Parliament had been in a great degree the cause of much demoralization, and that the system of credit that had grown up under the County Courts Acts had been a very great social evil. It was with this evil that he desired to induce their Lordships to grapple. He must beg their Lordships to remember that there were two or three positions which the opponents of this measure took for granted, but which he could by no means admit. The first was that it was good and expedient in the interests of the poor man that he should retain the facilities of credit he now enjoyed. But these facilities of credit were a constant temptation to the labouring man to live beyond his means and to make him familiar with the inside of a prison. For what was the consequence? A man who was committed to gaol for debt lost his self-respect, and came out a degraded man in his own estimation. The second proposition that was assumed for granted, was that a creditor had a moral right to imprison a debtor until he had obtained payment of his debt. This he denied in toto. When the creditor came to him to ask for the imprisonment of his debtor he thought he had a right to ask him under what circumstances he had given him credit. Did he know the position of the debtor—that he was a working man dependent on weekly wages? Did he know anything of his habits of life—that he was suffering under the exigency of sickness or any other calamity? Did he give him credit without inquiry, and merely that he might involve him in his books, charging him in many cases 100 per cent for the articles supplied over and above what he need have paid if he had gone with ready money in his hand? It was the creditor who was able to undergo such an examination satisfactorily to whom he should alone be willing to give the power of pursuing the debtor to a prison. Another argument against his Bill was, that a debtor who owed £10 or £20 stood on the same footing as the man who owed £500 or £1,000. But what distinguished the case of a poor debtor from that of a rich debtor under the existing law was, that the future property of the rich debtor was not held liable for the payment of his debts, while the poor debtor was compelled to mortgage the labour of his hands for ever until he had satisfied the debt, and the law called his future earnings “ability to pay.” The result was that, under the fear of imprisonment, the poor debtor was frequently obliged, when pressed by one tradesman, to run up a debt with another, in order that he might wipe off the score contracted with the first; and thus he was always under a cloud, and always on the verge of ruin. A County Court Judge wrote as follows:—

“The poor man or his wife goes to the shop, and asks for a few things, promising to pay when the weekly wages shall have been received. On the Saturday night the money is taken, and the goods are paid for; but then more goods are had; and very soon a back reckoning is left unsatisfied, the man being frequently in full employ, and with no prospect of improving his means. He is thus induced to live beyond then, and he becomes practically insolvent. Then follows the County Court summons, and the order to pay, usually by monthly instalments—say at the rate of 1s. a week. Now, consider his position. He has been accustomed to spend 1s. or 2s. a week above his income; he is now called upon, not unfrequently with an increasing family, to apply a portion of his earnings to discharge the past debt. Some few, no doubt, may extricate themselves, and wisely see the propriety of living in future within their means. Others run into debt at another shop, while the judgment debt is discharged. Others wait till the creditor takes out a judgment summons, and then comes the usual question for the Judge of the County Court, ‘Has the defendant brought himself within the penal provisions of the County Court Acts?’”

Such was the legitimate effect of the measure for the speedy recovery of small debts, with its notoriously oppressive power of imprisonment. He would trouble their Lordships with one more illustration in regard to the case of the tallymen. In the first place, however, he wished to say that he did not mean to be indiscriminate in his remarks. Soon after the introduction of his Bill, a general meeting of dealers was held in London, at which a resolution was unanimously passed in favour of the abolition of imprisonment for debt; and he had no doubt that the main provision of the Bill was similarly approved by large numbers of the same class throughout the country. After speaking of the tallymen, the same County Court Judge from whom he had already quoted proceeded to say—

“So much in justice to the men. Of their system of trading, however, I must speak very differently. The enormous number of poor men that it brings before the County Court is its simplest and most evident condemnation. A Return to Parliament of the number of plaintiffs levied by this class of traders would astound the public. I have known an instance where a single hawker has taken out more than fifty summonses from one Court for the same day of hearing. They make the Court their ‘debt collector,’ thereby saving themselves the trouble of going for the fortnightly or monthly 6d. or 1s. to the poor man’s cottage. And then, what has been so often objected to the system, their visit is usually made when the husband or father is absent at his work.”

It was not the case, as their Lordships had been told, that a husband or father was liable to pay only when he had consented to the order being given. If a dealer left goods in a house, although without the knowledge of the master, and those goods were used and worn by the wife or daughter, the man became liable notwithstanding he was no party to the ordering of them.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, the man must have seen his wife or daughter using the goods. There were other cases, however, in which the husband or father might have no knowledge whatever of the existence of the goods.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR wished to confine his remark to the cases mentioned in the Returns of the County Court Judges. A recent number of The Solicitors’ Journal gave a long list of cases decided in one day in a County Court, when, although it was proved that in many instances the goods had been left during the absence of the master of the house, and in some even without the consent of the wife, defendant after defendant was ordered to pay the debt with costs. There could be no doubt whatever that the law as it now existed was a source of much mischief, and it was idle to attempt to defend it on the ground that imprisonment was necessary for the recovery of debts. He granted that if these small debts should be encouraged, and if the creditor should have a right under every set of circumstances to put his debtor in prison, then the law should be preserved in its present condition. But he desired to know what right a man who gave credit wantonly and recklessly had to inflict injury upon society by requiring it to furnish him with the means of keeping his debtor in gaol. Under the existing system, not only was the poor debtor demoralized, but his family were pauperized, and heavy burdens were thrown upon the public. Let their Lordships consider these things, and then let them ask themselves whether it was just, moral, or expedient that such a state of things should be permitted to continue any longer. The noble and learned Lord concluded by expressing his desire that all the details of the Bill should be patiently and anxiously investigated in Committee.

THE EARL OF DERBY remarked that the noble and learned Lord had directed his observations mainly to the encouragement given by the existing law to the system of reckless credit. It was, however, under a state of law which previously existed, but which had now been abolished, that reckless credit was accompanied by the power of imprisonment. Imprisonment was at present limited to cases where the creditor was not reckless in giving credit. There were many persons who, although possessed of the means, refused to satisfy the demands of their creditors, and to whom therefore it could not be said to have been recklessly given; and these persons were justly liable to imprisonment. He believed that the power which the County Court Judges had of inflicting that penalty had had a good effect in the vast majority of cases where persons behaved in that manner, not denying their obligation, but declining to pay. He had heard of a man coming before a County Court Judge, not disputing the debt, but setting the law at defiance by a refusal to pay, while all the time he was chinking the money in his pocket. The noble and learned Lord had laid great stress on the hardship to the debtor of requiring him to pay weekly instalments out of scanty earnings; but he proposed an attachment for the wages, which operated practically in the same way on the debtor, but was further open to the objection that, as the employer would certainly refuse to incur the trouble which such an arrangement would impose upon him, and would dismiss the debtor from his service, so that the creditor would, in fact, lose his best chance of payment.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, that he had not been able to make up his mind that imprisonment could be dispensed with to the extent proposed by the noble and learned Lord. He could not think it desirable to abolish imprisonment in the case of a man who had the means of paying his debts and refused to do so.

termination or repeal by the United States of the “Reciprocity Treaty” and of the “Bonding Act,” under which instruments facilities for mutual commercial interchange have been afforded, and a large and increasing trade has grown up with the Colonies of British North America?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, there were no negotiations pending with regard to the suspension or repeal of the “Reciprocity Treaty;” and the Government had received no official information upon the subject of the “Bonding Act.”

BRITISH SUBJECTS IN CHINA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Under what Rule, Ordinance, or Law, British subjects in China are subject to trial in the Consular Courts for breaches of neutrality in the present Civil War in China?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he had not been able to obtain any information with regard to the trial of any persons for a breach of neutrality in China. But the jurisdiction which was exercised by the British Consular Courts in that country was exercised under three Orders in Council, dated the 13th of June, 1853, the 2nd of February, 1857, and the 12th of September, 1863.

CONVICTS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Why the long sentenced Convicts in Ireland from seven years and upwards are not sent to Western Australia in the same manner as the long sentenced English Convicts?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, in reply, that in Ireland since 1853 the practice of sending Convicts to Australia or other Colonies had been discontinued. The Irish Convict system enabled the authorities to dispose of their criminals at home. Transportation had been found to be productive of very great mischief, and it was also attended with considerable expense. The present system worked satisfactorily, and the whole expense of a Convict was not more than about £20 a year.

NAVY—THE “RESEARCH” AND THE “ENTERPRISE.”—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would beg to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty respecting the damaging Report of the result of the recent firing aboard the Research. He held in his hand a letter which contained this passage—

"I suppose you have heard that the Research has turned out a perfect failure. The Commander-in-Chief inspected her last Saturday and had her guns fired with blank. The first discharge brought down all the bulkheads like a house of cards, jumped the pinnace nine or ten inches out of her crutches, and broke her back. Nearly all the glass on board was broken and the stanchion bolts underneath the battery were snapped short off by the concussion. I went aboard next day and saw the extent of the damage."

He hoped the noble Lord would state, Whether the arrangement in the Research contrived by Mr. Reed for carrying heavy ordnance is satisfactory, or whether the firing had not been found very destructive to the ship herself?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that the trial of the guns on board the Research, which took place a few days ago, was the cause of the loss of a considerable amount of crockery, and had also been attended with some damage to the bulkheads of the vessel, because she had not been prepared for action by taking down certain moveable bulkheads on deck, and by removing glass skylights before the firing had commenced. But there was no reason to suppose that the arrangement for firing the guns was unsatisfactory, or that there had taken place any explosion very destructive to the ship itself.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that with a view to put himself in order he would move the adjournment of the House. He considered the Question to be one of great importance, and it was most desirable that the real facts should be brought under the notice of the House. The answer of the noble Lord did not, according to his information, give the true facts of the case. He held in his hand a communication from an officer of high rank, in which he described the ship as having become a complete wreck. The Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth had ordered her out of the Sound for the purpose of firing five rounds from each of her guns, which consisted of 100-pounders and 68-pounders; the former to be fired with 16 lb. of powder, and the other with 12 lb., by no means excessive charges. The result of the experiment was to send the pinnace three feet out of her "crutches," to break her back, to break the bolts of the stanchions, to destroy the whole of the standing bulkheads, to smash every atom of crockery, and to send glass flying about the lower deck, which might have killed a number of men, and which had actually wounded the carpenter, who was the only person on that deck. His informant further stated, that independently of that the ship was totally unfit to go to sea, that she was only three feet and a half or four feet out of water, that she could not possibly rise to the sea, and that if she went to sea she would absolutely and certainly be lost. That was the first-fruit of the exercise of the powers of the Constructor of the Navy. The sister ship, the Enterprise, had not as yet been tried, but from her they could but anticipate similar results. There were besides a number of ships drawn by the same gentleman, which were at present in course of construction; and under those circumstances that was a matter of very great gravity, and one which the House ought at once to take up and investigate, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were to go on with the construction of those ships without having the opinion of those constructors who had been educated at the expense of the State, but who had been superseded by a man who had been only partially instructed, and who, although favoured by the press and the Government, had in that his first essay turned out a vessel that was absolutely useless to the country. He would ask the noble Lord whether the statement he (Sir James Elphinstone) had just made was not substantially correct, and whether the vessel in question was not an unmitigated failure? In conclusion he begged leave to move the adjournment of the House.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could not help thinking that his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, had received a very one-sided and exaggerated statement of what had occurred on board the Research. He (Lord Clarence Paget) had that day seen a list of "the defects" caused by the firing of the guns on board the vessel, the cost of repairing which would be somewhat under £30. The Admiral in command sent the ship out to be inspected, and the firing took place without the precaution of removing the bulkheads and skylights. The consequence was that the bulkheads went down, and glass was broken; but hon. and gallant Officers knew that if the ship had been going into action the bulkheads would have been put down, and the glass would have been removed below. As to the stanchions, he had heard no account, but he had heard that no accident whatever had occurred to the standing parts of the vessel.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that the statement of the noble Lord would lead them to believe that there was no defect in the construction of the vessel. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: Hear, hear!] But it appeared that there had been some great neglect in making the experiments, and he thought it was only right that the subject should be investigated, so that they should ascertain who was answerable for that neglect, in order that he might receive a fitting censure.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, whether the flotation of the Enterprise is not deeper than had been calculated, and whether she is not undergoing repairs to counteract her too great depth in the water?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: So far from the Enterprise drawing one foot of water more than was intended she draws one inch less.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE PRUSSIAN IN JUTLAND.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, in moving the adjournment of the House at its rising until Thursday, said, that as to-morrow was the Queen's birthday, and on Wednesday the great bulk of the Members would wish to be elsewhere, probably there might be some difficulty in getting a sufficient attendance, and it would therefore be more generally agreeable that the House should adjourn over.

Moved, "That the House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday."—(Viscount Palmerston.)

MR. WHITESIDE: Before the Motion is agreed to I wish to ask the noble Lord, whether he has received, in reference to what is called "the armistice" between the belligerents, any information to the effect that twenty-four hours after the truce was in operation, and three days after notice of it had reached Jutland, Major General von Bornstedt, a Prussian General, addressed the following communication to the Provision Committee of Viborg:—

Lord Clarence Paget

"Should these my moderate commands not be instantly and scrupulously obeyed by the Provision Committee, I would give the gentlemen upon whom the execution devolved an opportunity to consider on bread and water their stubbornness, and would take by force of arms what the usages of war allow."

I also wish to know—not by way of interfering in any way with the progress of the Conference towards a happy pacification, but simply in reference to the manner in which our own Government has adjusted the terms of the armistice—whether it is a one-sided armistice, depriving the Danes of every opportunity of asserting their power at sea, where they have many advantages, and at the same time leaving them to be annihilated upon land? I wish to know whether it is lawful for one of the belligerents to demand provisions, and whatever else he may require, without payment, pending the armistice, and to compel the inhabitants to labour in removing the fortifications of Düppel, that the Prussian guns may be able when the armistice is at an end more completely to sweep the Island of Alsen? I want to know what the terms of the armistice really are—not in the least with any desire to ask for any information as to the proceedings of the Conference, which is entirely a separate matter, and will have to be adjusted at the right time, but simply because, if a compact has been made with England such as has been described to us, it is for the honour of England, and of the Ministry, that a satisfactory answer should be given to my question?

MR. LAYARD: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that on Friday night, after a Question was put on this subject, and also after the House was counted out, and, therefore, too late to communicate it to the House, the Prussian Ambassador forwarded to us a telegram which he had received from Count Bismark, stating positively that orders had been given that after the establishment of the armistice no forced contributions should be raised, and that if any had been raised subsequently they should be returned; that any orders issued for the raising of forced contributions should be abrogated at once; and that all provisions furnished to the Prussian troops for the future should be paid for. With regard to the proclamation mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman, no official information has been received by Her Majesty's Government; but we have sent both to Copenhagen and Berlin for all the information that can be obtained with reference to all the proceedings of the Prussian troops in Jutland.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Have the Government received any information whether the orders issued have been obeyed since the establishment of the armistice, and whether payment has been made for all provisions?

MR. LAYARD: I cannot answer that Question, for, as I said, we are waiting for information. All I can say is, that we have a distinct assurance from the Prussian Government that no forced contributions shall be raised after that date.

MR. WHITESIDE: Do the terms of the armistice contain that obligation?

MR. LAYARD: Undoubtedly. It has been already stated that the suspension of hostilities inferred that from the 12th instant no forced contributions should be raised, and all provisions should be paid for.

MR. WHITESIDE: Is it an instrument in writing, and will it be laid on the table?

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman was addressed not to the Under Secretary but to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and he thought that a Question of that importance ought to be answered by the noble Lord himself, whom they all rejoiced to see back among them, resuming his place in their proceedings. It was extremely unsatisfactory that, when attention had been directed to what appeared to be an infraction of a solemn engagement, they should receive merely a cursory answer, that the Question should not be treated by the highest authority, and that the House of Commons should be left to guess, to a great degree, what the proceedings really were. He wished to know from the noble Lord whether, if the provisions taken by the Prussians were to be paid for, they would be paid for in money, or in some kind of obligation invented by the Prussian authorities?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State answered the Question because it referred to a departmental matter, with which he was, of course, much more conversant than I. With regard to the Question now put, my hon. Friend has stated that the armistice distinctly provides that no contributions should be levied after the signature of the armistice, and that all things required and had by the Prussian and Austrian troops shall be paid for to the people who deliver them. My hon. Friend has stated that M. Bismark, the Prussian Minister, has assured Her Majesty's Government that these engagements will be fulfilled, and we cannot take upon ourselves to doubt that the Prussian Government has the power to compel its local officers to obey the orders issued in pursuance of national engagements. As to the Question of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Darby Griffith), that really is one which is beyond my power to answer. The engagement is that payment shall be made; but with regard to the mode and the time, that is a matter which depends upon the arrangements of the Prussian Government, and I am quite unable to give any answer on the matter.

VACATING OF SEATS (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL—[BILL 107.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir George Grey.)

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked if all the Under Secretaries of State would be incapable of sitting and voting in that House, if there were one more elected at a General Election than the number generally allowed?

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID asked why the first clause of the Bill referred exclusively to the Principal Secretaries of State, while the second clause referred both to the Principal Secretaries and the Under Secretaries?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the object of the Bill was to make effective the Act of 1858. If there happened to be four Members holding the office of Under Secretary in that House and a fifth was nominated, his seat would become vacant, and he would not be capable of being elected so long as those four Gentlemen continued to hold office; but it was impossible to say which of the number ought to be excluded from voting. It was not really necessary that the Bill should be made to apply to a Principal Secretary of State, because his seat became vacant on his acceptance of office. If, however, it was thought there was any ambiguity it could be remedied in Committee.

COLONEL FRENCH thought there was some irregularity connected with the acceptance of office by the Vice President of the Council for Education, inasmuch as a new writ for Merthyr Tydvil was issued, when in reality there was no vacancy created. The appointment was confined to a Privy Councillor, and as the hon. Gentleman who was selected was not at the time a Privy Councillor, there was no proper appointment, and consequently the House had no power to issue a writ. He hoped that such an irregularity would not occur again.

MR. WALPOLE said, that as this Bill overcame the difficulty which it was intended to meet, and did not alter the law, he would not offer any opposition to the second reading; but, at the same time, he wished to guard the House against a conclusion which might be drawn from what had taken place upon this occasion. In the Committee upstairs there was a great division of opinion as to whether the fifth Under Secretary was or was not disqualified from sitting by the Statute of Anne, as well as by the recent Acts. His own conviction was that a new Under Secretary of State was within the Statute of Anne. But what he was now anxious about was that no general conclusion should be drawn from what had taken place this year with reference to seats which might be vacated, or be held to be vacated, in some future year under similar circumstances. If the Statute of Anne had been rigidly observed—that is to say, if it had been held that whatever the number of new Under Secretaries who were in the House, they must all go to their constituents for re-election upon accepting office—no harm could have been done, because each one must have undergone that trial which every Minister of the Crown upon accepting office was bound to submit to. But if the number of Members of that House who were entitled to hold office without going back to their constituents was not restricted, two dangers would arise, and those dangers would materially affect the independence of the House. In the first place, the number of persons who could hold office without going back to their constituents at all would be increased, which was contrary to the whole spirit and intention of the Statute of Anne; and in the second place, as had been pointed out already by his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire, an inducement would be offered to the Ministry to put the Principal Secretaries of State into the other House of Parliament, and leave the Under Secretaries in the House of Commons, instead of complying with what he conceived the constitution required—namely, that those great Officers, particularly when they were connected with the principal Estimates, should be in that House, so as to be responsible for all the questions and all the discussions which arose in that House with reference to their Departments particularly, and when those questions and discussions related to matters connected with the revenue. As the Bill did not alter the law he should not oppose it, but he took that opportunity of protesting against any general conclusions being drawn from the circumstances which had taken place this year, or from the Bill itself; and he could not agree that the holders of any of these offices were to be considered as privileged to sit in that House without going back to their constituents, if the offices they held did not exist before the Statute of Anne. If such a conclusion were ever drawn the independence of the House would be more struck at than it had hitherto been within his recollection. He hoped the House would be careful not to consent to anything derogatory to its dignity and independence.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that his right hon. Friend might safely assume that nothing which had occurred this year, and nothing contained in this Bill, could be productive of any such precedent as that of which he had justly expressed his apprehension. If he understood the view of the Select Committee correctly, it was that the office of Under Secretary was not a new office within the meaning of the Statute of Anne. Whatever might be the law with regard to any similar office created de novo, this Bill simply dealt with the particular case of the office of Under Secretary. It adhered to the limitation which recent Acts of Parliament had placed upon the number of persons holding that office who might sit in the House of Commons. It made that limitation more stringent and effective than it was, and it did not countenance the notion that any new or different offices could be created which should be exempt from the whole operation of the statute.

BEER HOUSES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland ought to furnish to the House some explanation as to the necessity of this Bill.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Bill appeared to English Members a very extraordinary one, for it would place beer-houses in Ireland on a totally different footing to that on which beer-houses in this country were placed. In this country beer-houses sold beer to be drunk on the premises, without any interference by the police; whereas, by this Bill, beer-houses in Ireland would be subject to stringent regulations, both at the hands of the magistrates and the police. Would the Government have any objection to frame a measure extending what they now proposed for Ireland to this country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he made a statement in respect to this Bill upon moving for its introduction; but as it was at an hour of the morning when very few Members were present, he would repeat the grounds upon which this measure was introduced. In Ireland, he regretted to say, the great source of crime and disorder was the intoxication which was encouraged by the beer-houses as well as by the whisky shops. In consequence of the establishment of a great many additional beer-houses, in Dublin particularly, intoxication had increased to a frightful extent, and crime had augmented in proportion, the existing law not allowing the police to enter into those houses as they were permitted to do with regard to the houses of licensed victuallers. In 1861 there were only three regular beer-houses in Dublin; whereas now, owing to the extension of the trade, there were 270, in addition to 1,100 licensed victuallers and grocers' shops. In that state of things criminality of the worst kind existed. It further appeared that houses of ill-fame in close proximity to those beer-houses had largely increased of late. By a defect in the law the police were powerless in preventing crime which might originate in these beer-houses, as they were not authorized to enter those house. He was aware that the Bill would create certain differences between the law of the two countries, but in Dublin and other large towns, the evil had risen to such a pitch, that the Government at his suggestion, and with the approval of the inhabitants of Dublin, had thought it right to bring forward this measure. This was not a Bill that could be considered as involving a question of revenue, but solely one of policy. By the list he held in his hand it appeared that the number of convictions for drunkenness had increased to a frightful extent in Dublin within the last three years. In 1861 the total number of persons convicted for drunkenness in the Dublin metropolitan police districts was 8,561—namely, 5,305 males and 3,256 females; in 1862 the number was 11,269—namely, 7,199 males and 4,070 females; in 1863 the number augmented to 13,227—namely, 8,714 males and 4,513 females. Since the 1st of January last there were 6,341 convictions for drunkenness—namely, 4,338 males and 2,013 females. Now, if that rate were to continue throughout the year it would make a total of 16,912 convictions. In view of such a state of things it was impossible for the Government to resist the pressure put upon them for a new measure of legislation to check this rapidly increasing evil. Now, under the existing system there was not only a vast increase of crime emanating from those houses, but the beer which they sold was adulterated with a great many deleterious substances. He held in his hand a statement of the various articles with which they adulterated the beer. In answer to an inquiry, one beer-shop keeper said that he knew there was a good deal of "dash" put into his beer. On being asked what that meant, he said that a good deal of the Liffey entered into it. It appeared that the following ingredients were mixed with the beer: Cocculus Indicus, nux vomica, copperas to give it a head, vitriol to give it smartness, molasses to give it colour, and various other things. Under such circumstances he put it to the House whether it was not necessary, as a matter of public policy, to give the police the power of entering those public-houses. Those establishments were licensed to sell beer not on the premises. The proprietors, however, generally took out the three-guinea licence, and evaded the payment of the other guinea for a full licence, which would enable them to sell beer in smaller quantities out of the house. The time he thought had come when, in the interest of the poor man, that state of things should be put an end to. Those houses remained open to an early hour of the morning, and their customers during all that time were drugged by this horrid stuff which they called beer. The Bill would oblige those houses to close at certain hours, and would impose certain other restrictions which he trusted would have the effect of putting a check to the evils to which he referred.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it was a satisfaction to know from the right hon. Gentleman that the people of Ireland were disposed to adopt beer as a national beverage instead of whisky. He was sorry to hear that the beer in that country was mixed with so many deleterious ingredients; but he was glad to observe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was sitting next the Chief Secretary for Ireland when he made his important and interesting statement, and he trusted that the House would never again hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Ireland was in no way interested in the repeal of the malt tax. If, however, the House should hear that argument again, he trusted that it would be vigorously combated by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that the right hon. Gentleman would, in the interest of the poor of that country, advocate the repeal of the malt tax, which no doubt tended to promote the evil of adulteration, which was quite as much felt in England as in Ireland. There would be no objection on the part of English Members to place the Irish beer-houses under due restrictions.

MR. BAGWELL said, however bad the beer was which was sold in Ireland, it was nothing in comparison to the kind of spirits which the people there were obliged to drink. Those vile adulterations were caused by the higher duty which was put upon spirits, and crime and madness had increased to a frightful degree. He, however, could find nothing in the Bill of the right hon. Baronet to prevent the adulteration of the beer of which he complained.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH trusted that the introduction of the present measure would stimulate the Home Secretary to bring in a measure for regulating beer-shops in England. Such a measure would receive support from his (the Opposition) side, which had besieged the Home Office for the last ten years in favour of the more stringent regulation of beer-shops. These houses might be more stringently supervised, either by magisterial licence or police supervision. He thought that some simple police regulations might be introduced which would enlist the owners of beer-houses on the side of sobriety, law, and order more strongly than at present.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the police already had the power of entering every house for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and so far the Bill would assimilate and not separate the law of England and Ireland. Beer-shops were subject to restrictions which were not imposed upon public-houses. They were obliged to close at seven o'clock in the country, and at midnight in London and the large towns. They were not allowed to keep open all night like the public-houses. It was, however, he would admit, difficult to obtain convictions involving the forfeiture of the licence and the shutting-up of the house. He believed that it was possible on the third conviction for the magistrates to close the house for a limited period. He thought that if the police had the power of entering these public-houses and laying information, the law would not be so powerless as it was at present in Ireland to arrest disorder.

COLONEL DICKSON was glad that they had found an Irish subject in which English Members seemed to take an interest, although a collateral one. He was sorry to hear the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland admit that since he went to that country the number of houses of ill-fame had increased so largely in Dublin. He (Colonel Dickson) did not wish to oppose the second reading, but he thought the measure ought to be one of a much more complex character. It appeared to him that the only effect the Bill could have would be to interfere with the drinking of beer in Ireland. Now he was of opinion that it was most desirable to encourage the use of that beverage in Ireland, instead of the much stronger liquors to which the people were so long accustomed. He concurred with the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell) in thinking that there was nothing in the Bill to prevent the frightful adulterations that were going on. The whole system of licensing required alteration. The great curse of Ireland was the great number of drinking shops. He hoped that the right hon. Baronet would withdraw this Bill, and introduce one of a much wider scope.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he saw no objection to the Bill, which aimed at the substitution of a superior class of vendors of beer. He wished he could see anything in the measure to discountenance the adulteration of beer by means of Cocculus Indicus, nux vomica, and vitriol, and to insure the sale of a more wholesome liquor. He feared that the right hon. Baronet expected too much from his Bill, and that the least injurious admixture in Irish beer was the water of the Liffey.

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman was greatly mistaken if he were legislating upon the notion that there were not adulterations of beer in England as well as in Ireland; because inquiries on the subject had brought to light the fact that many of those articles which he mentioned were used quite as much in adulterating the beer in this country as in Ireland. It appeared to him that there was something in the remedy suggested by the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), because if beer were made cheaper, then there would be no such temptation to adulterate. He (Mr. Henley) deprecated the principle of having a separate law for Ireland upon this subject—he thought that they ought to have only one law for both countries. He did not know precisely what was the population of Dublin, but he thought it was something about 200,000; and 13,000 convictions for drunkenness in the year was no doubt a very large proportion. In Liverpool, last year, the convictions were 12,000, out of a much larger population. He believed that if people were determined to get drunk they would effect their object in spite of all laws intended to restrain them. He was altogether averse to making the law more restrictive in Ireland than it was in England.

MR. HENNESSY asked, whether the Government contemplated including brewers, who sold beer in large quantities, which was not to be consumed upon the premises, within the operation of the 6th clause?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Evidently not. The beer-house keeper was licensed to sell beer not to be drunk upon the premises, but in consequence of the want of police supervision it was drunk on the premises, and thus the law was evaded. It was now proposed to issue the three guinea licence and another at a guinea, and the police could then go in and see that tipping did not take place upon the premises. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell) he should be delighted if the Irish people could get good beer, but it was impossible for the House to legislate as to the quality of the article. He knew that his hon.

Friend (Mr. Bass) had opened several large depôts for his ale in Ireland, and he hoped that the sale would be such as to lead to the introduction of a much better article than was now generally sold there.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he could find no clause in the Bill for the prevention of adulteration.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, its object was not to prevent adulteration except as alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Mallow, by raising the character of the beer-shop keeper through the supervision of the police.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he was sorry to dash that little bit of consolation from the right hon. Baronet's lips. In England police supervision had certainly not had that effect. He served on the Adulteration Committee, and the evidence given before them went to show that the beer in London was very much adulterated. One of the medical witnesses stated the effect of drinking a quart of London beer by a countryman was to produce coma, from the large quantity of Cocculus Indicus which found its way into it in spite of police supervision.

MR. HENNESSY said, that Ireland had excellent brewers of her own.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he could not understand how the police were to prevent adulteration, unless they were empowered to taste it. Did the right hon. Baronet intend that the police should go round from house to house tasting the liquor sold there. He reminded the right hon. Baronet that no steps had been taken to prevent adulteration in this country. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would not in the future stages of the Bill advertise Mr. Bass's ale at the expense of Messrs. Guinness's native production.

BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES (SCOTLAND)
BILL—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN HAY moved that the House go into Committee, in order that the Chairman might be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to authorize the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to issue their notes in Scotland, and to make such notes a legal tender there.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the mere mention of this Bill had caused much discussion in Scotland. The people were at a loss to know what it meant, and he hoped the hon. Baronet would state what was the purport of the Bill.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the object of the Bill was simply to make the Bank of England note pass current north of the Tweed, which was not the case now. It would be very convenient to all parties if they could make it a legal tender in Scotland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it would be only courteous to the hon. Baronet, seeing that it was admitted that there were points in the banking system of Scotland which deserved the consideration of the House, to go into Committee, and give him an opportunity of submitting his plan. Further than that he could not go; because what the hon. Baronet treated as a very simple matter appeared to him to be very far from simple, and he could hardly imagine any single proposal connected with the currency that could raise a greater number of difficult questions. The hon. Baronet wished to make Bank of England notes to pass current north of the Tweed. But there was nothing to prevent Englishmen from taking Bank of England notes into Scotland or Scotchmen from receiving them. He understood that at present in Scotland paper was not a legal tender, and therefore this was a proposal to introduce it for the first time, and in favour of a note manufactured in England. They were not in a state to legislate on the Scotch bank issue this Session. There were great difficulties surrounding the proposal. It would require careful weighing, and if adopted it would have to be adopted with the general goodwill and consent of the people of Scotland, and, probably, in conjunction with many other subsidiary arrangements. He did not object to the introduction of the Bill, but he was not prepared to say he could give it his support on the second reading.

Considered in Committee.

CASE OF CAPTAIN MELVILLE WHITE.

PAPER MOVED FOR.

COLONEL FRENCH moved an address for a Copy of the Award made by the Senate of Hamburg in the case of Captain Melville White. Captain White was a gentleman who had distinguished himself for his gallantry in every country he had visited. He had saved the lives of the English and French Consuls in the Red Sea, and, in addition to that, he had succoured a great number of vessels in a sinking state; and on the breaking out of the mutiny in India he went out there at his own expense, and did his country great service. This gentleman had occasion to enter the republic of Peru, when he was seized without cause, imprisoned, and most brutally treated—so treated, in fact, that the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs declared that it was one of the worst cases that had ever come under his observation; and the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary declared that it was a case which demanded reparation, and must be enforced by the whole power of England. The officers of the Government, on inquiry into the case, considered that £4,500 should be demanded from the Government of Peru as a requital for his sufferings. Captain White, however, considered that a disproportionate sum, and it was proposed that the decision should be left to the Senate of Hamburg; but Captain White claimed that it should be placed under the arbitration of the Emperor of the French. The Government would not accede to his views, and the arbitration was left to the Senate of Hamburg. They were ready to enforce the demand of £4,500, but they declined to make a demand for some £100,000, as wished by Captain White. The matter was, however, referred to the Senate of Hamburg, who, after considerable delay, decided that Captain White was not entitled to any compensation whatever. The question, however, referred to the arbitration was between £4,500 and a larger sum. He therefore asked for a copy of the award, in order that he might be in a position to bring the subject before the House.

MR. LAYARD said, there was no objection to the production of the award, but the difficulty of getting a reliable translation of a German document of eighty pages full of technical phrases would occasion some little delay. The case of Captain White was well known. Her Majesty's Government were under the impression that Captain White's treatment was not justified, and a demand was made for compensation. A certain sum was offered; but Captain White declined to accept it, and it was proposed to refer it to the Senate of Hamburg for their mediation. That was accordingly done. They went through the matter most carefully, and they ultimately came to a decision adverse to Captain White. He was at a loss to know what course Her Majesty's Government could take. Captain White had submitted to the arbitration of the Senate of Hamburg, and of course must be bound by their award.

BANK ACTS.—RESOLUTION.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee for the purpose of agreeing to the following Resolution:—

"That it is expedient to enable certain Banking Co-partnerships which shall discontinue the issue of their own Bank Notes to sue and be sued by their Public Officer," said, the intention was to remedy a technical defect in the law, which had arisen out of the language of the Act of 1844. The intention of that Act was to confirm to certain banking Co-partnerships the privilege of issuing bank notes, subject to certain restraints and limitations; and it was also intended by that Act that, in case any bank should desire to surrender the power of issue, it should escape from the limitations and restraints attaching to that power of issue, without incurring any new disability. A case had lately arisen in which the National and Provincial Bank, wishing to surrender its power of issue for the purpose of commencing banking business in London, had been advised that one effect of that surrender, under the present law, would be that it would lose the privilege of suing and being sued by its public officer. That clearly was not the intention of the Act of 1844, and it was to remedy this defect that he proposed to introduce a declaratory Bill.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE PRUSSIAN IN JUTLAND.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I rise to put a Question to the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, of which I gave him notice on Monday last. As the Conference, after a somewhat long adjournment, will meet on the 28th, it is important that we should know how far the engagements entered into by the belligerent powers on the 9th have been fulfilled; for if we should find that, in point of fact, these engagements have not been faithfully performed, we shall have but little confidence in any future promises that may be made. If I am not misinformed, the engagements entered into by the belligerent Powers on the 9th were to this effect—that they would not interfere with the commerce or with the communications of the country which they occupy, not interfere with the existing civil administration—that they would not levy any war contributions, and that they would pay for everything that their troops received. Now, unless I am greatly misinformed, it can hardly be said that any one of these five engagements has been thoroughly performed. The commerce of the country has been interrupted by impounding and placing under lock and seal large quantities of valuable goods intended for commercial purposes. The communications of the country by road are dependent entirely upon the caprice of the officers in command. The communication by telegraph has been broken entirely by the removal of the wires. I do not know for certain that any new war contributions have been imposed, but rations for men and horses have been exacted without payment, and those for the soldiers of the most extravagant kind. It was stipulated that, on the contrary, so far from exacting contributions, everything should be paid for. I understand that on the 12th an order was given for the delivery of rations, and that not one word was said about payment; and the contributions not having been delivered on the 13th, an order was given for their immediate delivery, with a threat that if the delivery did not take place, those who did not comply should be placed upon bread and water. That, I understand, is the state of things at this moment. There may have been some cases of payment, but I am informed the payments have not been made in money. The payment has only been in receipts for goods delivered, acknowledgments of indebtedness on the part of the Prussian Government; documents which, of course, are of no market value whatever. It is possible that subsequent orders may have been issued from Berlin. That may have been in consequence of the representations of the noble Earl or of the other Powers on the Continent, or in consequence of the evidently rising indignation of the people of this country. But certainly the Prussian Government did not commence the armistice by acting according to the stipulations they had agreed upon. Of that I apprehend there can be no doubt whatever. They contracted at the Conference, not with the Danish Government alone, but with all the Powers assisting in the Conference; and, therefore, in departing from their engagements, they have committed an offence, not against Denmark alone, but against every one of the contracting Powers, each of which is justified in resenting that offence by the blockade of the ports of the belligerents, or by any other suitable measure. I hope that a better state of things may now have commenced. But it is impossible for me not to feel that this state of things could not have happened had the influence of this country been what it once was. I cannot conceal from myself that there prevails in Germany an impression that, do what they may, say what we may, we shall not lift our arm for the purpose of arresting the progress of their wrong doing. My Lords, I am very ready to acknowledge the zeal, the earnestness, and the great ability of the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Department. I think that the position of the noble Earl has been beset by difficulties of an unusual character, which, under any circumstances, would have been embarrassing; but I cannot abstain from declaring my opinion that these difficulties have been greatly increased by the conduct of the noble Earl himself. My Lords, last year, the premature and inconsiderate declaration, that under no circumstances would this country go to war for the sake of the establishment of a better state of things in Poland, deprived our diplomacy of all its efficacy, of all hope of success in the negotiations that were then being carried on. It is a vain idea indeed—it is a perfect dream—to hope that mere moral opinion can produce any effect whatever in diplomacy. The strength of diplomacy resides altogether in the force by which it is supported, and in the belief that, under the circumstances which may arise, that force may be employed for the purpose of maintaining its rightful demands. If you take away that supposition, the despatches of the Foreign Secretary can have no more weight than that which would attach to the collective opinion of any twelve or fifteen respectable gentlemen meeting in Downing Street to discuss any public matter; authority it can have none. This was the state of things so far as it affected Poland. This year what have we done? This year the noble Earl has most distinctly expressed his opinion upon the policy to be pursued. Substantially and in effect what the noble Earl said was this—

“Hear Mr. Gladstone—‘look around, see the vast progress of our prosperity and the enormous amount of our commerce. It would be a sin to risk for the defence of innocence and of weakness, and for the protection of right against might—the might of the wrong doer—any portion of that wealth which Providence has bestowed upon us for our own especial enjoyment.’”

My Lords, I differ altogether from those who can entertain that opinion. I do not hold that power, and strength, and wealth are given to a state, any more than they are given to an individual, for his own personal enjoyment and satisfaction. The State and the individual stand under the same circumstances of responsibility. They are each subject to the obligation of doing good and of preventing evil; and we have done neither. My Lords, I cannot help feeling at the same time that there is another difficulty beyond that which has arisen out of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. There is another difficulty of the greatest magnitude which has materially affected the influence of this country with Foreign Powers. I cannot but think there is a strong impression on the Continent, and especially in Germany—an impression which it would be contrary to constitutional principle to admit to have any real foundation—but which certainly does exist on the Continent, and is gradually pervading society in this country, that in all public questions relating to Germany Her Majesty's Ministers have as much difficulty in carrying out a purely English policy as was experienced in former times, as history teaches us, in the reigns of the two first sovereigns of the House of Hanover. When George III. came to the throne, and first met his Parliament, he declared, in his own words, that born and educated in this country, he gloried in the name of Briton. By that declaration he won the hearts and obtained the confidence of his people. He at once relieved his Government from that unpopularity and weakness which had attached to the Governments of his predecessors, from the persuasion that they were swayed by German partialities. The people believed him to be an Englishman and nothing but an Englishman—to be one of themselves—to feel as they did—to be identified in all respects with the English people. That feeling inspired the loyalty which enabled him to go through without danger the difficulties of the revolution with which he had to contend. I do trust that in this question of Denmark, Her Majesty's Ministers will so act as to show to Germany and the whole world that the policy and feelings of George III.—those truly English feelings which regarded only English objects—still animate the Government of this country, and that they will succeed in overcoming that impression which is now extending itself on the Continent, and overspreading this country, and in restoring to our diplomacy the authority and influence which it has now lost. I will ask the noble Earl whether the proceedings of the Prussians in Jutland, since the armistice has commenced, have been conformable with the engagements entered into in the Conference?

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, the noble Earl certainly gave me notice a few days ago that he should make some inquiries as to the manner in which the engagements entered into in the Conference for the suspension of arms had been carried out in Jutland; but the noble Earl did not give me notice that he meant at the same time to make observations upon the conduct of the Government in relation to foreign affairs in matters extending far beyond Jutland—beyond the question, large, difficult, and intricate as it is—the question between Germany and Denmark—extending even to the question of Poland. I think it would have been fair—I think it would have been more in conformity with the course usually practised in Parliament, and certainly practised in that House in which I have spent the greater part of my political life—if the noble Earl, intending to make this attack, had given me notice that he meant to do so. As to the Questions which he has asked of me, I will answer, in the first place, with respect to the manner in which the agreement for the suspension of arms has been carried out in Jutland. The Danish Government have stated that it is their intention to collect in as accurate a form as possible all the facts, and when they are in possession of those facts, and can rely upon them, then only they will lay a statement—containing, at all events, an accurate statement of facts, before the Powers with whom they have agreed to negotiate. I consider that to be a prudent and wise mode of proceeding; and until they have done so it is not for us to assume that mere rumours or statements in newspapers or private letters are perfectly accurate and true. But with regard to the assertions which have been made here and elsewhere, the Prussian Government was applied to and they have made this statement upon that subject. I am about to give your Lordships, as well as I can, the statement made by the Prussian Government, without at all attempting to defend their conduct or making myself responsible for the statement. The Prussian Government say that they thought fit, I think on the 28th of April, to make an estimate of the value of the ships captured by the Danish cruisers, and finding that estimate to amount to £50,000 for Prussian ships, and £40,000 as the value of other German ships, they directed Marshal Wrangel to levy contributions in Jutland to the amount of £90,000. I believe that proceeding to be in itself a novelty in the history of war; but be that as it may, their answer is, "We are at war, and we believe this to be one of our belligerent rights." A part of this amount was raised; but the Prussian Government say that immediately the King had sanctioned the agreement for a suspension of arms, orders were sent to Marshal Wrangel not to levy any further contributions; and that if contributions had been levied since the 11th, the persons who had paid the contributions should be re-imbursed the sums received from them. The account we have received from our Ambassador is that orders were sent from Berlin on the 10th, and he thinks it probable, and it appears to me very likely, that although the orders might have reached Marshal Wrangel on the 12th, yet they were not in the hands of all officers commanding corps or divisions of regiments upon the morning of that day. It appears from some accounts which have reached us, that demands were made on that day. There is a Danish statement that upon the night of the 11th the Prussian seals were placed upon several magazines and stores of private merchants and manufacturers, as security for the payment of contributions. The seals were afterwards taken off from some, but I cannot say whether they were taken off from all. That is the Danish statement, although it does not come from the Danish Government. With respect to provisions, it appears that orders were certainly given that all demands for provisions and rations for the troops should be paid for. It is probable from what we have heard that the payments have not been made in specie, but it is asserted that payments are made in the shape of acknowledgments. I do not know whether care has been taken to avoid making further requisition, or whether, if any further requisitions have been made, they have been paid for in money. The Prussian Government are bound by the terms they have made for a suspension of arms, which the noble Earl has correctly represented; they are bound to see that no further contributions should be levied; and if further demands of provisions should be made, then that they should be fully paid for. We all have in our recollection the terms upon which the suspension of arms took place; but we have thought it better, however, to wait for the statement of the Danish Government rather than to rely upon mere rumours. The noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) went on to say that all this had been done because it was not expected that Her Majesty's Government would have recourse to force to prevent them. But the noble Earl must recollect that in this instance the engagements were made, not with the British Government alone, but with the Governments of France, Great Britain, Russia, and Sweden, who were all represented in the Conference; and if these things were done—if the suspension of arms was set at defiance—the Prussian Government is liable to be called to account by all the Governments for the violations of their engagements which they have committed. It cannot be said that such conduct is a wanton indignity or insult to the British Government alone; what has taken place is an indignity and an insult to all the Powers who were represented at the Conference. The noble Earl, not satisfied with putting his Question, has spoken of the general course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued in regard to foreign policy. I must say, with reference to this particular Question, as I told a noble Friend of mine who raised the point some time back, that while this country is bound to defend its honour and any paramount interest it may have in any part of the world, it is not alone responsible for maintaining the balance of power in Europe. I think in the engagements which this country has made—whether the engagements of 1852 or those of a more ancient date—whenever the question of this general balance of power in Europe has arisen, the obligation has been one, not of this country alone, but of this country along with several other Powers, bound, whenever the case arose, to consult those Powers as to what the obligations were, and what ought to be done in the circumstances. If I may advert to the conduct of the person whom I consider to have been the great founder of the foreign policy of England in modern times—namely, King William III.—he always sought out for allies on the continent of Europe, and acted with those allies to the great benefit of Europe and to the reputation and glory of England. I certainly stated on a former occasion, that the flourishing condition of our finances and trade is a reason not lightly to imperil such a state of things. I might have stated also this other ground—that no country can really keep up its character for strength, and its power of asserting its position in Europe, unless its finances are in a satisfactory condition. I reminded you how the Peace of Amiens—the most disastrous peace we ever made, by which France was left in possession of the greater part of Europe after an unavailing contest—was brought about by the distressed and disordered state of our finances; and I implored you to take care, lest when your honour or interests may be attacked, it may be impossible to assert that honour and give effect to those interests if your finances are disordered by useless and unnecessary wars. The noble Earl referred also to the case of Poland. When that question arose Her Majesty's Government, following the example set by the Government of Earl Grey, made remonstrances to Russia, founded on the Treaty of Vienna. An answer was given to those remonstrances, addressed to England, France, and Austria. A reply was sent and further representations made; but the general answer was that, when tranquillity was restored, the condition of Poland should receive the consideration of the Russian Government. That, in fact, closed what may be called the negotiations, although there was much subsequent argument. But when I made the statement in this House that I could not advise this country to go to war to re-establish Poland, I considered that negotiation with Russia, so far as it could have influence on Russia, was at an end, and there was nothing to do but to resolve whether, in that state of circumstances, you would go to war for Poland or not. Now, of all the wild, imprudent, and extravagant wars that were ever engaged in, a war to establish Poland would have been the most wild, the most imprudent, and the most extravagant. When you consider that no Government had been established by the insurgents, and that even the insurrection had not raised its head with effect—when you look to the vast extent of the country to be re-established, and consider that it would have amounted to nothing less than the dismemberment of the Russian Empire, which everybody who had the conduct of affairs in that empire was bound to resist to the utmost—to have gone to war then for the re-establishment of the Polish Government, however much the Poles by their bravery, generosity, and conduct had merited the sympathy of Europe, would have been most unjustifiable. Well, but what was I to do? I have always considered that if you do not mean to go to war for a nation in a state of insurrection, nothing can be more immoral, more perfidious, more destructive of confidence, than to hold out hopes to men which must afterwards be disappointed. Therefore I was between these two conditions—either I must speak in favour of the Poles and go to war in their favour, or I must tell them plainly that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to go to war. Well, the latter was the course I took. I proclaimed here, and proclaiming here I proclaimed it to the world, that it was not our intention to go to war for Poland; and from that moment no Pole could with authority or reason say that he relied on British support, and was betrayed by the want of it. I cannot but think it is a source of satisfaction to me that, in the first place, I did not advise war for Poland; and, in the next place, not advising it, that I did not hold out to the Poles that we were about to do that for them which we did not intend to do. The noble Earl may think that we ought to have gone to war for Poland; he may have thought—though I hardly believe it—that not intending to go to war for Poland we should have endeavoured to impose on the Government of Russia the belief that we were about to make great sacrifices to rush into a war without any definite object in view, and by so doing to sacrifice the lives of men as brave, as generous, and as patriotic as ever lived. My Lords, my resolution was to do neither the one nor the other. The question of going to war is a serious matter, not to be lightly talked of. The noble Earl has referred to the example of George III.—a most patriotic Sovereign, with every feeling in his heart that prompted him to defend the honour of his Crown, and the welfare of the country over which he reigned. But as to his views of policy and the Ministers by whom he was advised, it is not to be forgotten that in this House a Member of that Cabinet, on entering into a war for the purpose of subduing insurrection in America, declared that the Americans were a parcel of cowards, and that this country would easily get the better of them, and suppress the revolt. In the course of that enterprise you spent £100,000,000 and lost thirteen provinces. On another occasion a great revolution took place in France—France changed her Government; and the Government of George III. must go to war to change republicanism in France to monarchy, and bring back the Bourbons to the throne. In that enterprise there was £550,000,000 spent, and oceans of blood were shed. I consider these two wars two of the most unwise—two of the most unjustifiable wars in which this nation ever engaged. The noble Earl has referred to other matters which I think he might have spared. He has referred to the advice which Her Majesty's Ministers have given to their Sovereign. All I can say is this, and I say it with perfect truth—that however much Her Majesty may have, as other Princes have, their private affections—connected as she may have been by marriage with a Prince who derived his birth from Germany—much as she is connected by the alliance of her daughter with German families—Her Majesty's great object has been to maintain intact the honour, to maintain high the reputation, to maintain the interests of this country. And however much Her Majesty may desire that every step, whether relating to Germany, or Denmark, or any other subject, should be carefully weighed by her advisers, there has been no one occasion on which, when those advisers have deliberated and have given the result of that deliberation to Her Majesty, Her Majesty has not wholly followed their counsels, and adopted the Resolutions to which they had come. Therefore, my Lords, having stated this, I need hardly state that which follows, that if the interests of this country have been deserted—if there is any stain on its honour—if there has been any abandonment of those great interests which we are bound to preserve—if there has been any abandonment of the interests of Europe, which we with others are bound to look to—it is upon the heads of Her Majesty's advisers that the responsibility must rest. Let that responsibility be as great and as heavy as it may be, we can transfer it to no other quarter; we must take it all upon ourselves—and, for my part, I am perfectly willing to be held responsible for the course we have adopted.

LORD BROUGHAM did not wish to prolong that discussion, but his noble Friend near him having referred to the indignation of the people of this country in regard to the acts of plunder committed in Jutland, he must say he never yet knew so unanimous an opinion or so strong a feeling to exist among all classes, all ranks, and all parties in this country on any question, either of foreign or domestic policy, as now prevailed in favour of Denmark and against Prussia. By saying against Prussia he meant against the Government of Prussia, whose frauds and cruelties and wrongful deeds had not brought them the least glory. They had pillaged and oppressed the weak; they had gained a certain accession of territory and taken a considerable booty; but glory they had gained none. But these were the acts of the Government alone; the people of Prussia were not at all responsible. Their case was very different from that of the people of America, who were responsible as a people for the violence and bloodshed unhappily desolating their country. But, as regarded Prussia, the responsibility was confined to the Government.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I cannot allow what was said by my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office, as to what took place in 1831 with reference to Russia and Poland, to pass altogether unnoticed. I deny that my noble Friend can draw any justification or defence for his recent policy with regard to Poland from what occurred in 1831. Speaking on the spur of the moment, without having any opportunity of referring to papers relating to transactions that took place so long ago, I cannot, of course, trust my memory as far as details are concerned. But I can say, with the most perfect recollection of the fact, that the whole tone and effect of the correspondence on the part of this country with Russia at that time was totally different from that of the recent despatches of my noble Friend on the subject of Poland. Your Lordships will allow me further to explain, as one of those who objected to my noble Friend's policy with respect to Poland, that I never did object to it because it had not plunged this country into war. I never did object to his openly declaring that he intended to avoid war on that question. I agree with him that as it was clear that this country ought not to enter into such a war, it was but fair and just to the Poles that that determination should have been made known to them. But what I think may be most legitimately found fault with is this—that, being determined not to go to war, and that determination being made publicly known, the noble Earl should have thought fit to engage in an irritating correspondence with Russia on the subject of Poland, which could not but be most impolitic and injurious to the character of this country.

Earl Russell

Where was the wisdom or advantage of bringing forward impracticable proposals to which he called on Russia to agree, or of holding aggravating language about the iniquity of her conduct, and then laying before Parliament all those scolding despatches, which might have been very good as school boys' themes, but which, as they were to lead to nothing, were unworthy of statesmen sitting in a Cabinet? A great country certainly ought not lightly to engage in war; and it is not for us to be the general redressers of the world's grievances. But, on the other hand, I hope the rule is not to be laid down, that England is to remain an indifferent spectator in all cases of any amount of wrong committed among nations, and that, because other States think fit to shrink from the common duty of defending the weak against the strong, when there is a favourable opportunity, and we have the power to do it, we are to abstain from doing so. I say that there are cases in which the power of this country ought to be exerted to prevent wrong being done. But when you satisfy yourself that a case is not one for your interference, and that you clearly ought not to take up arms in regard to it, I say it is not for the credit, the character, or the dignity of this country that its Government should address to another Government scolding language, like an impotent old woman. That is the opinion I have always entertained, and the results of the course taken by the noble Lord have only confirmed me more strongly in it than ever. I do not, however, mean to enter into this question now. We have already partially discussed it, and perhaps a future opportunity may arise of further discussing it even in the present Session. But considering my relationship to the person who was at the head of the Government in 1831, I could not sit by and hear my noble Friend defend his policy with respect to Poland by comparing it with the policy then adopted.

SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CLERGY DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL—[H.L.]

[No. 79.] SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, after presenting several petitions in favour of the Bill, proceeded to move its second reading, and in so doing said: My Lords, I will state, as shortly as possible, the necessity which exists for a measure of this description. I have no doubt that many of your Lordships are not in the least aware that there are any disabilities affecting the Scotch Episcopal Church. I have heard persons say that they did not know that there was an Episcopal Church in Scotland at all; and from conversations which I have had with some of your Lordships and others, I have found that a deplorable ignorance exists on this subject both out of doors and within the walls of this House. The Episcopal Church in Scotland has existed ever since the Reformation. At that time most, if not all, of the Bishops in Scotland remained of the same religion as before. Bishops, however, were appointed to the vacant Sees, but they were not consecrated though they sat in Parliament in virtue of their Sees. This went on until, I believe, there was only one of the original or genuine Scottish Bishops remaining alive, namely, Beaton, Archbishop of Glasgow, who died in 1603. When King James came to the English throne, he determined to re-establish the Episcopal Order in Scotland. This was in the year 1610. At that time the Archbishop of Glasgow (Spottiswoode), Bishop Lamb of Brechin, and Bishop Hamilton of Galloway, who were previously titular Bishops of those Sees, came up to London to be consecrated. The Bishop of Ely objected to their ordination, but Archbishop Bancroft of Canterbury moved that they be consecrated on their Scottish Orders as being perfectly good. The Episcopal Church went on in Scotland as the Established Church till 1638. In that year a General Assembly was held at Glasgow, which not only deposed the Bishops, but excommunicated them, and at that time excommunication carried with it grave civil consequences. During the time of the Commonwealth, the Episcopal Church in Scotland almost entirely disappeared, but at the Restoration, King Charles the Second determined again to restore it. For this purpose, Dr. James Sharp, Mr. Fairfowl, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Leighton, all in Presbyterian Orders, came to London, where, after being ordained Deacons and Priests, they were consecrated Bishops by the Bishop of Winchester, with the assistance of two other Prelates. Dr. Sharp was named Archbishop of St. Andrews, Mr. Fairfowl, Archbishop of Glasgow, and two others were appointed Bishops of Galloway and Dunblane. They went down to Scotland and consecrated the remaining ten Bishops. At the Revolution in 1688, James the Second was driven from the throne. I should have mentioned that the State had restored the temporalities of Bishops, and the civil status of the clergy. But in 1689-90, the Episcopal Church was again dis-established, and the Presbyterian form was re-established. The State again took away from the Episcopal Church that which alone it had the power of giving it—its civil status and its temporalities, but it did not take away its spiritual status, because it had not the power of doing so. That remained as it was in 1661, and the spiritual status remained unmolested from that time down to the present, the Episcopal Order being continued, so that the present Bishops of the Episcopal Church in Scotland derive their Orders and status from the same source as the right rev. Prelates who sit in this House. I mention this at the present time, because some persons are under the erroneous impression that this is an attempt for the first time to bring the Episcopal Church into close communion with the Church of England. It has never been otherwise. Archbishop Tillotson, when he first held a benefice in England, had Scottish orders, having been ordained in England during the time of the Commonwealth, by Dr. Sydeserf, Bishop of Galloway; and the Rev. James Greenshields, who was ordained by the Bishop of Ross in Scotland after 1690, was admitted to a curacy in the diocese of Down, and afterwards to a curacy in the diocese of Armagh, which he held till 1704, when he returned to Scotland. The validity of his Orders, which had been unquestioned in Ireland, was now questioned in the Scottish capital; but the judgment of the Civil Courts, which had called them in question, were on appeal reversed by a judgment in the House of Lords in 1710. Then the well-known Dr. Burnet, who had been minister of Salton in East Lothian, was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury on his Scotch Orders. There were several others I might mention. There was one case in the reign of William III., when Dr. Alexander Cairncross, who had been Archbishop of Glasgow from 1684 to 1687, was appointed Bishop of Raphoe in Ireland. There are several other cases of clergymen of the Scottish Episcopal Church being appointed to benefices in Ireland, who were ordained after 1600, when the old Episcopal Church ceased to be the Established Church. I only allude to these instances for the purpose of showing your Lordships the intimate connection there has always been between the two Churches—the Church of England and the Episcopal Church in Scotland. But with regard to the present position of the clergy in the Episcopal Church in Scotland, an Act of Toleration was passed in the reign of Queen Anne, relieving them from some of the disabilities which they then laboured under. The Bishops of the Scotch Episcopal Church were still recognized by their ecclesiastical titles, Queen Anne, on two separate occasions, in 1704 and 1706, having, by Royal Warrant, directed donations of £100 to each of the Bishops of Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Moray, and Dunblane. From the time of the succession of the House of Hanover to the Throne, the persecution of the clergy of the Scottish Episcopal Church commenced. They were, in fact, non-jurors and partisans of the House of Stuart, and after the rebellions of 1715 and 1745, most stringent and most cruel enactments were passed against them. They continued subject to these persecutions till 1788, at which time the last male descendant of the Stuarts died. In 1792, a Bill was introduced into this House by the Earl of Kellie for the purpose of removing certain disabilities affecting the clergy and laity of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. Its second reading was moved by the Earl of Elgin. The Bill was from the first very strongly opposed by Lord Chancellor Thurlow; and amongst other things, whilst the Act professed to remove all disabilities, he introduced a clause imposing new disabilities upon the Scottish Episcopal clergy which they had not been subject to before, namely—

“Provided also, and be it further enacted, that no person exercising the function or assuming the office and character of a pastor or minister of any order in the Episcopal Communion in Scotland as aforesaid, shall be capable of taking any benefice, curacy, or other spiritual promotion within the part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, or of officiating in any church or chapel within the same where the liturgy of the Church of England as now by law established is used, unless he shall have been lawfully ordained by some Bishop of the Church of England or of Ireland.”

The Bill was warmly supported by Dr. Horsley, Bishop of St. David's, who answered the Lord Chancellor's objections, also by Lord Stormont and the Earl of Kinnoull. The clause thus inserted in the Act of 1792 had the effect of preventing any person who had been ordained in Scotland from holding any benefice, or even from officiating in England. These provisions were relaxed to a certain extent by an Act passed in 1840, which enacted that any Bishop in England or Ireland, on the application of any Bishop of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, or of any Priest of such Church, might grant written permission to such Bishop or Priest to perform Divine service, and administer the sacraments for any one day or two days, but not more, in any church or chapel within his diocese. So that here are Bishops having the same descent as those of the Church of England, and clergymen holding the same office—subscribing to the same articles of religion—incapable of holding any benefice, or even officiating in England or Ireland. And mark the contrast. Any person, whether a native or a naturalized British subject, ordained by a Roman Catholic Bishop in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or abroad, is eligible to hold a living in England or Ireland, and it is nothing but the civil disabilities inflicted upon Scottish Episcopal clergy by the civil law that prevents them from doing so also. It is not an ecclesiastical disqualification, but purely a civil disqualification imposed by Act of Parliament. All that I seek to effect by this Bill, and all that is sought for by those persons who have petitioned so strongly in its favour, is that the Bishops and clergy of the Scottish Episcopal Communion ordained in Scotland, shall no longer be debarred by Act of Parliament from taking any benefice, curacy, or spiritual promotion, or from officiating in England and Ireland. The petitions which I have presented, signed by both clergy and laity in Scotland, have all the same prayer. They are quite willing to recognize the rights of the Bishop in England to satisfy himself in the amplest manner of the doctrine and character of the person he is asked to licence. Now, with regard to the ordination of any person in Scotland, he must have a clear title in the diocese from which he comes; he must also take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and sign the Thirty-nine Articles, and the ordination is exactly the same and exactly in the same words as the ordination of clergymen in the Church of England. The Prayer Book and Liturgy of the Church of England is the authorized Liturgy of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. I know that it is objected that there is another Communion Office authorized in Scotland. But that is no longer so. The only authorized canonical version is that contained in the Book of Common Prayer. There is no doubt that in some of the older congregations in Scotland they have been in use to celebrate the Holy Communion in a particular form, and these are permitted still to do so, but it is mainly in the northern counties where that obtains, and for myself, who have lived in Scotland all my life, I have never once heard that form used. It is becoming more rare. These congregations have handed the form down from father to son, and it is the feeling amongst them that it should still continue, but at the present moment, in all the new congregations, the form of the Church of England is the only one used, unless there should be a large majority of the congregation who request the Bishop of the diocese to allow the older form to be used. But I know it is the general feeling in Scotland that the English version only shall be used. My Lords, this is a matter in which I feel the greatest possible interest, both as a Scotchman and as regards the Church of England. I have as strong a feeling in favour of the maintenance of the integrity of the Church of England as any one of your Lordships, and if I thought that the Bill would, directly or indirectly, affect the Church of England in an injurious manner, I should be the last person to offer such a measure to your Lordships' consideration. But the object of the Bill is to remove a reproach and a stigma which, to a certain extent, rests upon the Scottish Episcopal Church. I may state that of the 161 clergymen of the Scottish Episcopal Church only seventy-nine have Scotch orders. The rest are all in English orders, and one reason of that is, that many of them, although Scotchmen by birth, came to England to be ordained, because they knew that if they were ordained in Scotland they would be under this unjust ban, which would prevent them from holding any benefice in England, or from even officiating in this country. The result is, that with regard to the qualification to be borne, it is found much more difficult to pass the examination for ordination in Scotland than it is in England. I will not detain your Lordships longer, but will now move the second reading of the Bill.

—(The Duke of Buccleuch.)

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Duke had made a very interesting statement, but he doubted whether their Lordships were sufficiently informed on the subject to come to a definite conclusion regarding it. The Church of England was connected with the State; but the Episcopal Church of Scotland was a perfectly independent body, which was free to adopt its own forms, and which differed in regard to some of them from the Church of England. He should like to hear what the right rev. Bench had to say on the matter. It would require, he felt, careful consideration to decide whether these disabilities could be removed, and, if so, what restrictions should be imposed in their stead. Under these circumstances, their Lordships would probably agree with him in thinking that the best course would be to consent to the second reading, on the understanding that the Bill should then go to a Select Committee.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he did not mean to offer any opposition to the second reading of the measure. He did not think they possessed sufficient information in regard to it, but there were, certainly, reasons why they should not at once reject it. The number of distinguished members of the Episcopal Bench who had received orders in the North, and the close intercommunion which had existed from 1741 to 1792 between the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of Scotland, ought to secure due consideration for the proposal of the noble Duke. The great difficulty of admitting to the English Church ordained ministers of the Scotch Episcopal Church was that it would create a double allegiance. He gladly accepted the suggestion of the noble Earl to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and hoped the noble Duke would agree to it.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM said, there were grave objections even to the second reading of such a Bill. He held that the title of the Bill did not properly describe it. The word "disabilities" and the expressions of the noble Duke were scarcely applicable to a body which was altogether free and independent of the English Church, and which differed from it both in doctrine and government. Nevertheless, by this Bill it was proposed that the clergy ordained by the Scotch Church, differing, as it did, in some particulars in doctrine from the Church of England, should be admitted to the benefices of that church. The Bill would be more truly described as one for diverting the endowments of the Church of England from those within to those without her pale. At first sight there might appear some hardship in admitting a Roman Catholic clergyman to the Church of England without re-ordination, and refusing that privilege to a minister of the Episcopal Church of Scotland; but it should be remembered that in the former case the clergyman renounced the Romish Church altogether. There had been some misapprehension as to Lord Chancellor Thurlow's position with regard to the Act of 1792. Whatever might be the Chancellor's theology, he had no doubt that, as an acute lawyer, he regarded the question as affecting the Royal supremacy. Bishop Horsley had also been referred to; but that prelate insisted on the clause for the protection of the Church of England. Bishop Skinner, the Scotch Episcopalian Bishop, who was in London at the time of the passing of that Act, and was in constant communication with the clergy of that period, stated that the words which had been referred to were not inserted by the caprice or humour of any single individual, but were the result of the decided judgment of a body of men who thought it their duty to secure the temporal emoluments of the Church of England to the clergy of that Church, and to them alone; and it was the feeling of the Scotch Bishops and clergy at that period that such a view of the case was not unreasonable. He added that had any Scotch clergyman been so ambitious as to aspire to the cure of souls in England, the Bishop of the diocese might very properly have said to him, "I make no doubt of the authority of the Scotch Bishops in their own Church, but neither the law of England nor of Scotland recognizes any such Bishop here; his orders cannot be put as a legal qualification, nor can they have any civil effect within the Church of England." It certainly appeared to him reasonable that the Church of England should be protected from having clergymen brought into it who had not been ordained, and whose qualifications had not been ascertained, by a Bishop of the Church of England. It seemed to him that a most important principle would be asserted by the second reading of the Bill. When the union between the Church in England and the Church in Ireland took place, the condition was, that the doctrine, service, and government of those two Churches should ever afterwards be one and the same. But in none of these respects was the Scotch Episcopalian Church one with the Church of England. The former Church had a service, which he believed all the present Bishops of that Church had pledged themselves to defend, and which only last year had been declared to be of final authority, but which was entirely antagonistic to the teaching of the Communion Service of the Church of England. He would not say that the Scotch Episcopal service was derived from the Church of Rome, because he should be told that it was taken from the Greek Church; but any one observing the language of the Scotch Episcopal service in reference to the consecration of the elements would come to the conclusion that it was founded on doctrine of the Church of Rome. He would not discuss that language—he would only state to their Lordships that two months ago one of the most learned and devout Bishops of the Scotch Church, speaking in the Synod of that Church, said—

“If the language of the Scotch Service-book had been the language of the Church of England after the Reformation, Latimer, Cranmer, and Ridley need not have been burnt.”

When it was proposed at a meeting of the Synod of the Scotch Episcopal Church a few months ago, that for the future in respect to old congregations the majority of the members should decide whether they would have the old service, but that with respect to new congregations, the service of the Church of England should be substituted; that proposal was rejected, and it was determined that every congregation should decide whether they would have the service of the Scotch Episcopal Church or the service of the Church of England. Another difficulty was this, that the Church of Scotland was governed by a Synod, consisting of twenty-one members, and the majority of that body could at any time change the service of the Church. The changes had, in fact, been numerous. This body could also, in times of excitement, ordain any number of deacons and priests to circulate their views. With regard to the endowment of the Scotch Episcopal clergy, there was a more obvious and fair way of effecting that object, and that was by the members of the Scotch Episcopal community endowing the Scotch benefices which existed. He understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested to a deputation who waited on him that they might follow the example of the Free Church of Scotland, and liberally endow the Scotch benefices. There was no want of zeal or liberality on the part of the members of the Scotch Episcopal community; but the reason that they did not take that step was because, unlike the Free Church, the governing body of the Scotch Episcopal Church had not the confidence of the laity, and therefore it was that the laity did not contribute towards the sufficient endowment of their clergy. There seemed, moreover, to exist in the Episcopal Church of Scotland a considerable degree of intolerance towards other communions. Looking, then, to the past history and to the present state of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, he had no hope. There seemed to be upon it a blight of internal division and of intolerance towards those without. When he read of Bishops using a little while ago language like this—that to suppose that the sacraments could be administered by Presbyterians descended from Presbyterians so as to be valid was an article not only the most mischievous, but the most rightly excommunicable; and when he found the Primus of the Scotch Episcopal Church, who, if not greatly changed from the time when he knew him, was a conciliatory and generous man, declaring that when there was set before the Presbyterians the light of the Episcopal Church, those who refused to join it were guilty of a sad and grievous sin, he had no hopes of that Church being productive of much good. He heartily felt that Episcopacy was a great blessing to our English Church. The more he read the more he was confirmed in that opinion; and he also felt deeply that he ought to be most careful how he excluded from the ministry of Christ's Church those who, agreeing with him in doctrine, differed from him in discipline. It was a fact, that those who entered the Church in Scotland were of inferior attainments to those of the same class in England. He could not but look upon it as one of the greatest perils threatening the Church of England, that they were compelled to admit into the Church men of inferior learning and attainments compared with the men admitted in times past. If, as the lower classes were increasing in intelligence and information, the clergy of the Church of England were to fall off in knowledge and education, the days of the Church of England would soon be numbered. Therefore, as he was obliged to admit to the ministry in his present diocese a far lower class of persons than he had done in Gloucester, so, as the standard became lower and lower as they went north, the Bishops of the Episcopal Church of Scotland were obliged to admit candidates of an inferior class still, and he deprecated being compelled to open his diocese to the invasion of a number of clergymen less educated than those who were already admitted. He was speaking once to a Scotch Bishop, who told him that his examination questions would bear comparison with those of any Bishop of the Church of England. But that was not the point. The difference was not in the questions, but in the number answered, and the fulness of the answers. He deprecated exceedingly the opening of his diocese to a number of men worse educated than his own, and thus deteriorating the position and influence of the Church in his own diocese, and generally in England. Looking at it, therefore, whether as a question of justice to the clergymen of the Church of England, by taking from them the livings to which they were legally entitled, or as a question of doctrine which the Church of England had distinctly condemned, or to the mischief likely to result to his own and other dioceses from the passing of the Bill, he felt bound, however reluctantly, to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months.")—
(The Bishop of Durham.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, as there was a very strong feeling against the Bill among the Bishops of his province, he thought he should hardly be doing his duty if he did not address a few words to their Lordships expressing his views upon the subject. He could not deny, in the first place, that the Bill appeared intended to remedy a real grievance; for a clergyman ordained in Scotland was in a worse position than even a Nonconformist minister, for the latter upon change of opinions might be ordained in England. But, at the same time, he confessed he did in some degree share the alarm which had been expressed. This question of the Scotch office was a very important one, and the Bill, if passed as it now stood, would undoubtedly be regarded as a theological triumph. He could not go further than this—namely, that if the Bill received any support from him it was to be distinctly understood that he did not regard that support as in any way sanctioning the Scotch office. He believed the Scotch Church would have done well when the subject was under consideration if they had excluded the use of the Scotch Communion Service. The Bishops of the Church of England had no guarantee for the permanence of the Scotch canons, because the Church of Scotland could by her representatives alter them at the shortest notice, and might adopt this or that doctrinal error. Here was a Church which might change its whole foundation in a few years; and then, if the Bill passed, the Bishops of the Church of England would be practically bound to receive from the Scotch Church candidates for their livings. Then there was another question which arose concerning the curates of the Church of England. Those gentlemen were entitled to look forward with reasonable hope to a share in the benefices of the Church of England, and the effect of the Bill would be to admit a large and influential class to a share of an absolutely limited number of the rewards in the Church. The body of the Church of England knew nothing of this Bill; the general public knew nothing of it. For these reasons he viewed it with very great distrust; but, at the same time, he should venture to consent to the second reading, provided the noble Duke would be willing, as suggested by the noble Earl (Earl Granville), to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, on this understanding, that that course committed them to nothing more than this—that they admitted that the Scotch Episcopal clergy were subjected to an evil from which they ought to be relieved.

LORD KINNAIRD said, that he was willing to assent to the second reading of the Bill on the understanding that it should be afterwards referred to a Select Committee.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he desired to state in a few words why he thought the present Bill was worthy of their Lordships' support. He would be the last to advocate intercommunion or near association with the Scottish Episcopal Church as proposed by the noble Duke, if he believed that his right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Durham) had correctly represented that body, or if he thought that any danger would ensue to the learning or doctrines of the Church of England. In reference to this proposal, he thought, however, they had also to consider the bearing of the Bill on the northern division of the United Kingdom. He did not believe that there was any possibility of satisfying the large number of persons who were attached to the liturgy and doctrines of the Church of England, and who now lived in Scotland, without cementing the union between the two churches. The Scottish Episcopal Church, whatever else might be said of it, was the only distinct representative in Scotland of the doctrines which they, as members of the Church of England, professed; and was the only body which afforded to those persons the opportunity of worshipping God according to the forms of the Church of England; for the congregations which represented the old qualified Episcopalians, and claimed to be independent of the Scottish Bishops, were too few to be of much importance. His right rev. Brother appeared to dread an invasion of illiterate persons from Scotland into the Church of England, as the result of the measure proposed by the noble Duke. On that point it was interesting to know the practice pursued. He held in his hand a letter from a person who had been ordained in Scotland, who laboured under the disability complained of, and who desired, if possible, to officiate in England. This gentleman stated, that no person could be ordained by a Scotch Bishop unless he possessed an University degree, or a theological degree from the College of Glenalmond; and that out of seven persons who presented themselves at Glenalmond for matriculation, at the same time with himself, three were rejected, and that these three afterwards, before he had completed his college course, received ordination in the Church of England within either the dioceses of Durham or Carlisle. He granted that their case was an exceptional one. But it might help to dispel his right rev. Brother's alarm, as to the comparative qualifications of Scottish and English clergy in matters of literature. The most important point was undoubtedly the matter of doctrine, and he did most sincerely regret that the authorities of the Scottish Episcopal Church did not see their way last year entirely to rid themselves of the Scottish office. He was not quite sure, however, that it was the Scottish members of the Scottish Episcopal Church, after all, who maintained this Scottish office. There were a good many eminent and distinguished scholars who held high office in the Scottish Episcopal Church, but it had also been the habit for persons very troublesome in the Church of England to take refuge in Scotland where they could obtain more of their own way. It was for the very purpose of breaking up this small clique that he desired there should be more free intercommunion with the Church of England. He believed that if they could see their way to such an arrangement as that proposed by this measure after it had been well ventilated, the result would probably be that the Scottish Episcopal Church would give up its eccentricities of doctrine. At any rate he thought the subject deserved to be thoroughly investigated, and he earnestly trusted that the noble Duke would accede to the request, and that the Bill would be read a second time on the distinct understanding that it would be submitted to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE was understood to express pleasure at the fact that the majority of the Episcopal bench did not intend to oppose the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, that one of the consequences of this measure would be to give the sanction and authority of the Legislature and of the Church of England to an extreme party in the Scottish Episcopal Church. What possible security had they that if this Bill passed things would remain on the comparatively moderate basis which at present existed? He feared that further alterations would be demanded. Since 1811 the canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church had undergone five alterations. If they threw the whole weight of the Legislature into the scale in favour of the extreme party in the Scottish Episcopal Church, they would be giving great discouragement to a numerous body of men in Scotland who would gladly put themselves under the control of that Church if they did not consider its doctrines unsound. He was afraid that the passing of the present Bill would inundate the Church of England with a class of men different in many respects from the present clergy of that Church. In his own diocese he had 103 livings worth less than £100 a year each—how would the working clergy of the Church of England be placed if a flood of fresh candidates for these benefices should be admitted. In the name of the working clergy of England he protested against the Bill.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he felt that it was impossible to dispose of a measure of this kind by a debate in that House, and he would therefore accept the suggestion of his noble Friend the Lord President.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that by assenting upon the present occasion to the second reading of the Bill, they would not be pledging themselves to the adoption of its principle; and there were many considerations connected with the measure which could only be discussed in a Select Committee.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he could not sympathize with the views which had been taken by some of his right rev. Brethren. The tone in which the measure had been opposed by some of them far exceeded what was necessary for guarding the ranks of the clergy of the Church of England from possible injury. He thought this Bill did require such guards, and he trusted that in Committee they would be introduced; but, at the same time, he had not the slightest apprehension of the inundation and flood of unenlightened men from the North which had so frightened his right rev. Brethren. His right rev. Brother who presided over the diocese of London gave an amusing turn to the argument, and the best proof that there was no danger of an invasion of extreme ignorance was that of a man who, failing a Scotch bishopric, obtained an English one. It was important that Bishop Horsley's words should not be misunderstood. That prelate declared that we had no right to interfere with the Scottish people, and therefore we had no right to ordain a Scottish chaplain against the will of a Scottish bishop. He could not sympathize with the narrow objection that had been raised as affecting the endowments of the Church of England. These endowments were certainly the patrimony of the Church, and what they wanted was that they should have the best furnished ministers of Christ to minister to Christ's people. It was not by keeping the endowments of each particular province to the clergy of it, and preventing the circulation of well-prepared men, that the Church of England would be made strong. As to the doctrinal point, he had himself a particular objection to the office spoken of; but he believed that, so far from tending to Rome, it was more remote from Rome than our own. An intimate friend of his, who was particularly learned in such matters, objected to our fraternising with the Scottish Episcopal Church, because her position in that matter was so ultra-Protestant that it would be attended with a danger of our injuring the Catholic feeling of the Church of England. The critical point of the doctrine of transubstantiation was that by the use of the prayer of consecration an essential change took place in the elements. But if such a change took place it would be a contradiction in terms to pray afterwards for the descent of the Spirit in order to accomplish that result. He believed that one great danger to the Church of England arose from the narrowing effect of her insular position; and if the sacred deposit of Divine truth could be guided undefiled he should be glad to see her welcoming on every side sister Christian Churches with sisterly affection.

The Duke of Buccleugh

ARMY—WITHDRAWAL OF THE GUARDS FROM CANADA.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the report that it is intended to diminish the strength of Her Majesty's Forces now serving in Canada by withdrawing two battalions of Guards now serving there?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I stated, Sir, last Friday evening, that it was intended to bring home two battalions of the Guards and one battalion of the Military Train, without relief. As I believe, the chief reasons for this arrangement are that a very heavy expenditure is now being incurred in the hire of buildings for the use and accommodation of the troops in Canada, and it is very desirable to reduce that expenditure as soon as practicable. It is also thought advisable to give an opportunity to Sir Fenwick Williams to concentrate the troops in Canada, which are now scattered over a long line of frontier. But, further, it is considered that by keeping such a number of Guards in Canada it would be impossible to form a brigade of Guards at home sufficient for service, in case they should be required to serve in any other quarter.

INDIA—THE BRITISH ENVOY TO BHOOTAN.—QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any information has been received of the imprisonment of the British Envoy to Bhootan; and, if so, what steps have been taken to procure the release of Mr. Eden.

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, he had received no public despatch upon the subject referred to by the hon. Member. The only information which had reached him was contained in a private letter from Sir John Lawrence. He had, however, no reason to think that Mr. Eden had been imprisoned, although he was subjected to some species of insult, with the particulars of which he was not at present accurately acquainted. Mr. Eden arrived safely at Darjeeling on the 12th of last month, and he found on his way home that some of the chiefs were preparing to take up arms to rescue him in case he had been detained.

STATE OF THE IONIAN ISLANDS. QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, When the British Protectorate of the Ionian Republic will absolutely cease; and, whether or not the present Lord High Commissioner, Sir Henry Storks, has published an Act, dated the 22nd April, 1864, introducing into the Seven Islands a purely democratic Constitution based upon universal suffrage, the right of voting being conferred upon every inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, persons under examination for felony and others previously convicted being alone excepted; if so, whether the action of Sir Henry Storks in this matter has been sanctioned by the Colonial Office, and whether the arrangement made is considered by Her Majesty's Government to be calculated to consolidate the Greek Kingdom, and is likely to promote the political security of the King of the Hellenes?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that on the 2nd of June there would be a transfer of the protectorate from Her Majesty to the King of the Hellenes. Sir Henry Storks had not published any Constitution, either democratic or otherwise, with a view to the future Constitution of the Ionian Islands. But Sir Henry Storks had received a request from the Government of the King of the Hellenes that certain electoral lists might be prepared for their use. Those lists were accordingly drawn up, and would be found available by the Ionian authorities. He had only to add that Her Majesty's Government entirely approved of the course pursued by Sir Henry Storks in that matter.

AFFAIRS OF CHINA.

QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Communications made by the American Minister, Mr. Burlinghame, at Pekin, in a Despatch to Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State at Washington, and dated the 20th June, 1863, respecting the joint policy to be pursued in China by the Ministers of England, Russia, France, and America, is substantially in accord with a Despatch addressed to Earl Russell, and a Copy of which Sir Frederick Bruce gave to the American Minister; and, whether a Reply has been given to Sir F. Bruce's Despatch, and in what sense?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that he had to state that considerable misapprehension appeared to exist with regard to what had been called the suppressed Despatch, and which the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) seemed to think was an agreement or memorandum signed by the representatives of the several Powers mentioned in the Question. He was not exactly aware to which Despatch Mr. Burlinghame alluded, as the date of the Despatch was not given, and neither had Sir Frederick Bruce informed the Government that he had ever communicated such a Despatch to Mr. Burlinghame. But a Despatch, which seemed by its date to be the one in question, had been received at the Foreign Office, and the only objection to laying that Despatch upon the table was that it contained matter relating to other Powers which it would not be for the public convenience to publish. If, however, the hon. Gentleman would allow him to give extracts from the Despatch, he would be prepared to supply him with all the information which he could desire to obtain. He (Mr. Layard) had himself quoted a paragraph from Mr. Burlinghame's Despatch, for the purpose of showing the policy which Her Majesty's Government had pursued and intended to continue to pursue in China, was in accordance with that advocated by the United States and other Powers. With regard to Sir Frederick Bruce, Her Majesty's Government had always felt the most complete confidence in him; and as there was no difference between the Government and Sir Frederick Bruce in respect of the principles laid down in the Despatch to which reference was made in the latter portion of the Question of the hon. Member, it did not require an answer.

POLAND.—RESOLUTION.

MR. HENNESSY, who had given notice to move the following Resolutions on the subject of Poland:—

"That the negotiations of Her Majesty's Government respecting Poland have not terminated in a satisfactory manner."

"That it appears from the Papers laid before Parliament that the conditions on which the British Government agreed to acknowledge the dominion of Russia in Poland have not been fulfilled by Russia."

"That this House is of opinion that Her Majesty's Government is no longer bound to recognise the sovereignty of Russia in Poland."

said, Lord Wodehouse, on his return from Denmark, had attributed in the other House the failure of his mission to the policy which the British Government had pursued with regard to Poland; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) a short time ago had said that there was an intimate connection between the Polish insurrection and the present state of affairs in Denmark, and that the deplorable condition of Denmark was strictly to be traced to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in those negotiations with respect to Poland. He had heard, also, that an eminent diplomatist, when the rumour reached this country that Lord Clarendon had succeeded in his mission to Paris (a rumour which was unfounded), remarked that if he had been so successful he must have had ample powers to deal with the Polish question. Finding that the Danish and the Polish questions were so intimately connected in the opinion of eminent authorities, he felt perfectly justified, even apart from the European importance of the subject, and the engagements which England had contracted in regard to Poland, in bringing on that discussion at the present moment. Nearly fifty years had passed since the British Government had entered into engagements with respect to the future of Poland, and it was our duty to see how far those engagements had been fulfilled. Poland was an integral part of Europe one hundred years before Charlemagne was crowned, and England had for centuries maintained intimate relations with that country. Malte Brun described the Poland of ancient Europe in glowing language as a most flourishing and prosperous country, where the mechanical arts and manufactures were encouraged by wise sovereigns. Poland was the first country to enforce the principles of free trade, and she had always been distinguished for her religious toleration. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) had on several occasions expressed some doubts on that point, but an authority whom he would no doubt respect—the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon—in a recent address delivered in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, had dwelt with great force on that point, “Religious liberty,” he said, “was the chief glory of Poland,” even at a time when every other country, England included, was given up to bloody butcheries on account of religion. She was the asylum of the oppressed from all parts of Europe, and, indeed, from all parts of the world. In one city there were three bishops of different faiths; and when a man went to exercise any of his civil rights, no question was ever asked him as to what communion he belonged. He had, he might add, himself heard a Protestant, as eminent in the Anglican Church as Mr. Spurgeon was among Dissenters, declaring at a meeting at Guildhall the same fact—that Poland was foremost in religious toleration—and he confessed that when he listened to Lord Shaftesbury on the occasion to which he referred, he could not imagine the hon. Gentleman behind him would again that evening, as he had done before, seek to cast a slur on the Poles on the very ground on which Lord Shaftesbury and Mr. Spurgeon were of opinion they were most deserving of praise. But be that as it might be, of the many centuries through which England maintained intercourse with Poland, the century during which Poland suffered under the rule of an elective monarchy was the period to which her weakness and dissensions were to be traced. Although that principle was nominally in force for two centuries, it existed, in fact, only during one century. Even during that period, however, there were to be found in Poland a number of men sufficiently enlightened to discover the weakness of their Government, and they, towards the close of the century, united themselves, under the presidency of Prince Czartoryski, and determined to alter their constitution. How, then, let him ask, did it happen that Poland did not alter her constitution as the Poles desired? The answer to that question was to be found in the attitude which was assumed towards their country by Russia, Prussia, and Austria. When the Empress Catherine of Russia received intimation that the ancient form of Polish government—hereditary monarchy—was about to be restored, she entered into a secret treaty with the King of Prussia, dated June, 1762, in which the following paragraph occurred:—

“Their Majesties the Empress of All the Russias and the King of Prussia mutually engage in the most solemn manner, under any circumstances, and in all cases, that if any one, whoever he may be, should attempt to establish an hereditary kingdom in Poland, their Majesties of Russia and Prussia will not permit it; but, on the contrary, will avert, repel, and annul in all ways, and by all means, projects so unjust and so dangerous to the neighbouring Powers by acting together, joining their forces, and even resorting to arms, if circumstances require it.”

Not only was that treaty signed between Prussia and Russia, but the Empress Catherine addressed a despatch to her Ambassador at the Court of Poland, in which she informed him that on account of the proximity of Russia to Poland the whole attention of the former should be directed to preserve entire the existing form of the Polish Government, and that she was determined, if things took a contrary course, to exercise all the power which Providence had given her to settle the affairs of Poland to the advantage of Russia. She added, in the secret instructions which she also sent to her Minister, that if necessary for the accomplishment of her object she would order her troops to invade simultaneously all parts of the Polish territory, and to lay waste their country with fire and sword. Such was the policy of Russia, and he would, with the permission of the House, conclude that part of the subject by referring to a despatch written by the French Ambassador at Warsaw to the Duke de Choiseul, in which he described the effect of that policy, observing that Russia had silenced and intimidated the greater part of the Polish nation by detestable and unheard-of violence on such persons of position as defended public right in the State Assembly, and by repeated acts of tyranny towards all those who ventured to act in opposition to her views. The Poles, however, still determined, even in the face of such opposition, to restore their ancient constitution, and, accordingly, on the 3rd of May, 1791, the Polish constitution was issued by the Sovereign and the Estates of the realm of that kingdom. That constitution, he might add, received the praise of Pitt and the leading English statesmen in many debates in relation to Poland which took place in that House between 1791 and 1795, and the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government might, perhaps, if he had come up from Harrow and taken his seat under the Strangers' Gallery, have heard Mr. Pitt declaiming on the subject. Mr. Burke, moreover, spoke of the Polish constitution in terms to which he wished briefly to allude, because the de jure Poland of to-day was the Poland which Mr. Burke had described when he said, speaking of the change made by the Poles, that, "in contemplating that change, humanity had everything to rejoice at and glory in; nothing to be ashamed of, nothing to suffer." Such was the description given by Mr. Burke of a constitution which lasted only from 1791 to 1795, because then the armies of the Empress Catharine, to which she referred in the treaty and in her letters, entered Poland, and it was divided among the three great Powers. Now, it was a matter of interest to inquire what England did on that occasion. It might surprise some hon. Gentlemen to hear that England, although he believed she did it unknowingly, actually contributed to the partition of Poland; for when that partition was about to take place the King of Prussia solicited a subsidy from the British Government to the amount, if he was not mistaken, of £1,200,000, on the ground that he wanted troops to oppose the French, while it turned out that, instead of employing the troops subsidized by our money against France, he employed them in the subjugation of Poland—a fact which did not escape the attention of the House of Commons, inasmuch as Mr. Jekyll, in referring to the subsidy on the 5th of February, 1795, said the last instalment to his Prussian Majesty had been paid on the 4th of October, but long previous to that period the Prussian troops had gone to co-operate in the infamous project of the dismemberment of unhappy Poland; while the subject was also alluded to by Mr. Whitbread and by Mr. Fox, who said that the Emperor of Germany might conceive that, perhaps, the best way to destroy those French principles against which the war was carried on was to apply the money received from England to the dismemberment of Poland. It was also remarkable that the first Russian fleet which entered the Mediterranean was commanded by an Englishman, took up the transport vessels attached to it in English ports, and was employed to destroy the fleet of Turkey, which was the ally of the Poles, and thus contributed to the dismemberment and destruction of Poland. In 1805 the Emperor Napoleon restored to independence one, and in 1812 another, portion of Poland, and in 1815 Lord Castlereagh exerted himself with some success to secure the establishment of an independent Poland. The return of Napoleon from Elba deranged the combinations of the Allies, and ultimately, by the Treaty of Vienna, instead of Poland being erected into an independent State, the Crown of that kingdom was conferred upon the Emperor of Russia. In accepting the Crown, the Emperor Alexander told the Poles that, by being placed under his dominion, they had obtained a Constitution appropriate to their wants and their character, the preservation in public enactments of their language, the restriction of public appointments to Poles, freedom of commerce and navigation, and facility of communication with those parts of ancient Poland which remained subject to other Powers, a national army, and a guarantee that every means should be taken to perfect their laws; and soon afterwards, in addressing the Poles, he said—

"Your re-construction is defined by solemn treaties; it is sanctioned by the Constitutional Chart. The inviolability of those external engagements and of that fundamental law insures for Poland henceforward an honourable place among foreign nations."

Notwithstanding these professions, the course which Russia adopted towards Poland was a complete violation of the Treaty of Vienna. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government had himself stated that the stipulations of that treaty were broken as soon as they were entered into, and that the greatest violation of treaties which had taken place in the history of the world was that which occurred in the case of Poland. In 1831 the Poles endeavoured to maintain the treaty by force of arms. He would not say that they rose in insurrection because the Grand Duke Constantine gave to General Zamoiski, one of his aides-de-camp, a letter authorizing him to proceed to the national army of Poland, which was then in the neighbourhood of Warsaw, and to release them from their allegiance to the Emperor. The Poles were defeated, and then fresh promises were given by Russia to Poland and to Europe. The Emperor Nicholas issued the Organic Statute, which up to the year 1862-3 was the law of Poland. The operation of that statute was illustrated by a "confidential report on the condition of the Kingdom of Poland, presented to the Emperor Alexander II. by Tymowski, Minister and Secretary of State, March, 1861." In that report the Minister said—

"The decree of 1831, although it constitutes to this very day the fundamental law for the Kingdom of Poland, and ought thus to be binding on the inhabitants of that country, has never yet seen 'a commencement of execution.' It may be said that since 1831, without any regard being paid to the pledges of the decree, the kingdom has been completely delivered over to the bureaucracy, and has remained exclusively under the thumb of the officials, without any participation whatever of the inhabitants, who were thus placed without the pale of the administrative hierarchy."

"Nevertheless, it must be added that such a result depends above all on the good faith with which the measures indicated are executed, for the country is radically imbued with the sense of law, and will appreciate the confidence bestowed upon it."

The events of 1861 and 1862 had been described in both Houses of Parliament. In the House of Lords, Lord Carnarvon called attention to the subject, and Earl Russell following him said that nothing could justify the violation of law and humanity of which the Emperor of Russia had been guilty. In 1861 there were no less than four successive Viceroys of Poland, each of whom tried a different system, and each of whom was recalled upon its failure. One of them, Count Lambert, took with him into Poland a Russian officer as Commander-in-Chief, who inaugurated the state of siege, and who, being reproached by the Viceroy for a massacre of men, women, and children which took place in the streets of Warsaw, drew out a pistol and committed suicide. Soon afterwards Count Lambert was withdrawn. He mentioned this to show how utterly impossible it was that Russia should govern Poland. It was unfortunate both for himself and for Poland that in 1831 the noble Lord at the head of the Government declined to join France in rendering assistance to Poland; but in 1855-6 there was another opportunity at which that country might have been saved by England. Three years ago he was to his astonishment informed by the noble Lord that, although there was a short despatch written upon the subject in 1856, during the Crimean war no despatch passed between our Government and others upon the subject of Poland. The House would be surprised to learn that at the time of the Crimean war such despatches did pass between England, France, and Austria, and, as they had been concealed from the country, he would read extracts from them, and ask the Government whether they were authentic. He had a copy of a despatch dated "Paris, December 15th, 1855," from Count Walewski, Minister of Foreign Affairs, to Count Persigny, then French Ambassador in London, in which the Minister said—

"The object of this despatch is to call your attention, and to engage you to fix that of the British Government, upon a question which excites, and with justice, the solicitude of the Emperor, and to which, doubtless, the Cabinet of London does not attach less interest. I mean Poland. . . . The first article of the Treaty of Vienna, 1815, in declaring the union of the duchy of Warsaw to the Russian Empire, provided that it should be unchangeably united thereto by its constitution under the name of the Kingdom of Poland. Even this was, doubtless, but a very incomplete reparation for the injustice of the partitions which annihilated Poland. Still it was an act of homage paid by Russia to the indelible principle of Polish nationality; and the Kingdom of Poland, with its constitution, with its distinct administration, and its army entirely national, in reality possessed guarantees which were wanting in the other dismembered provinces. . . . Contrary to the promises and to the formal assurances of the Emperor Nicholas, the Kingdom of Poland, incorporated with Russia, has since been nothing more than a province of that empire. The treaties which had constituted its political existence were openly ignored. Nevertheless, the Treaty of June 9, 1815, was then, as it is to-day, an act essentially European, by which all the contracting parties are virtually bound towards each other, and each of them towards all the rest. France and England protested against such an infraction of the public law of Europe, and if for the sake of maintaining the general tranquillity, they shrank from making it a casus belli, both of them with only the more emphasis reserved the rights in regard of which they had just protested, until an opportunity should offer itself for renewing them and upholding them with more chance of success. This opportunity, M. le Comte, cannot fail shortly to arise, and the moment is come for preparing to make the re-establishment of the Kingdom of Poland, within the conditions stipulated by the Congress of Vienna, one of the essential objects of the negotiations for peace, as soon as these negotiations shall become possible, as well as one of the fundamental bases of that peace."

What was the reply of the British Government? The House had never received it, and the country had never known it. But it was given in a letter written by Count Walewski to Count Persigny, and dated October 15, 1855. Writing from Paris, he said—

"Lord Cowley has read to me a despatch from his Government, in reply to that which I commissioned you to deliver to Lord Clarendon on the subject of the situation of the Kingdom of Poland, in its relation to the treaties which determined its legal condition in 1815, and to the eventual basis of the future peace. The Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs declares that, not only would the English Cabinet desire, like ourselves, that the obligations contracted by Russia towards Poland should be fulfilled, but that it would see in the independence even of that country the surest barrier for Europe against the invasions of the Russian Power. The only question in the eyes of Her Majesty's Government is, to know if the moment is opportune for entering into an engagement not to treat with Russia, except on the condition that she carries out the stipulations which concern Poland in the Vienna treaties. He comes to the conclusion that, without tying our hands or binding ourselves to any particular line of conduct, it is enough for us to agree that we will take advantage of events, within the measure of the possible, in favour of Poland."

On a subsequent occasion the French Government renewed their application, and met with a somewhat similar reply. Count Walewski, having become in the meantime the French Ambassador, said—

"I have spoken to the principal Secretary of State on the contents of your Excellency's despatch, dated March 26. I pointed out that if in a European negotiation, having for its object the re-establishment of peace with Russia, no mention whatever should be made of the breach of treaties of which the Russian Government was guilty in assimilating the Kingdom of Poland to the Empire of Russia—a breach against which we had protested—our silence might be treated as an implied sanction, and as an abandonment of our previous protests. The principal Secretary of State acknowledged the full value of this observation, and admitted that at an opportune time it would be desirable to take some steps of a nature to support the opinion previously expressed by France and England on the conduct held by Russia towards Poland in 1831; but Lord Clarendon, in his turn, observed to me that at this moment every attempt to bring Russia to restore matters in Poland to the position in which they were before 1830 would be inopportune, and might be attended with consequences to be regretted."

On the conclusion of peace in 1856 the French Government again urged the British Government to do something for Poland; and he came now to the only papers which had been laid before Parliament on the subject. In a despatch from Lord Clarendon to Lord Palmerston, in April, 1856, he stated that on the 9th inst., "at the request of Count Walewski," he held a conversation with Count Orloff on the subject of Poland, and Count Orloff replied that the Emperor had determined to restore to his Polish subjects everything which had been suggested in the conversation, but that the announcement could not be made to the Congress, as that would be misrepresented in Russia. Count Orloff said in a friendly manner—

"Do not, in the interest of the Poles, bring the subject forward in the Congress; for I can tell you nothing there, nor admit your right to interrogate me. My answer, therefore, must be disheartening to the Poles, and the Emperor may perhaps think it a matter of dignity to postpone what he intends to do."

Lord Palmerston, in reply, informed Lord Clarendon that Her Majesty's Government entirely approved the manner in which the subject had been treated by him, both in bringing the question under discussion with Count Orloff, and in abstaining from mooted the matter before the Congress. It was in the early part of 1856 that this conversation took place with Count Orloff. In May, 1856, the Emperor Alexander II. visited Poland, and having assembled round him the Polish marshals, senators, and clergy, addressed them in these terms—

"I am resolved that the order established by my father shall be maintained. Therefore, gentlemen, above all things let there be no dreams—no dreams. The welfare of Poland depends upon her entire absorption into Russia. What my father did was therefore well done. I will uphold it. My reign shall be a continuation of his."

This was the language held one short month after peace had been secured. Since then, from 1856 to 1864, the Poles had exhibited the greatest moderation and the greatest heroism. Lord Wodehouse, formerly Minister Plenipotentiary at St. Petersburg, bore testimony to this in his place in Parliament, and the same testimony had been reiterated in the course of their debates. But in 1863 the Russians, in violation of their own laws, enforced the conscription, with the avowed object of carrying off from the country every man possessed of public spirit. Under that conscription, University students and artisans were taken who were exempt from the conscription under the Russian law itself. That was done in the early part of 1863, and it caused the Polish war of 1863-4. Every Member of the House was as familiar as himself with what had since taken place in Poland. The Poles had maintained the unequal contest with greater success and for a longer time than in 1831. The Russian funds had declined from day to day, and were now lower than at any period during the Crimean War. It had been necessary to send hundreds and thousands of Russian troops into Poland, and even the Russian Guards, who had not been sent into the Crimea, had been marched against the Poles. The war had now been going on for thirteen months, and what had England done? Earl Russell had written a great many despatches. In the Christmas pantomime at one of the theatres a large box on the stage was labelled "England's aid to Poland." At the touch of a wand the front of the box fell down and discovered a very small ink-bottle and a very large pen. That was "England's aid to Poland." England, however, had promised to do much, and might have done a great deal. Earl Russell in his despatches showed that Russia had broken engagements to which England was a party, and he denounced Russia for violating public, international, and moral law. At one period of the negotiations Baron Brunnow came to Earl Russell in great alarm, and inquired whether the intentions of Her Majesty's Government were peaceful. Earl Russell published his reply in a despatch which was shown to the Ministers of France and Austria. The noble Earl said, in effect, that the intentions of his Government were peaceful, but that he must not deceive the Russian Government. The Emperor of Russia might reject the proposal he then made, as he had formerly rejected others, but the insurrection would probably continue, and conflicts and difficulties might arise, which all would deplore. The meaning attached to those words in Vienna and Paris was that the British Government had made up their minds that the engagements of England were to be preserved. The Emperor of Russia rejected the proposal, however, like the rest. The House rose for the recess, and Earl Russell wrote a despatch to Prince Gortschakoff. It was a very long one, and was not worth much, but the three last paragraphs had some sense in them, and struck every one as not having been written by Earl Russell. The question then arose, "Who wrote them?" He would give the House some information on this subject. The Governments of Great Britain, France, and Austria were then all acting together, and when Prince Gortschakoff's rebuff was received the Emperor of the French made a proposal to the Cabinets of London and Vienna, that an identical note in reply to Prince Gortschakoff should be drawn up by Count Rechberg and sent to Russia by the three Governments. The Emperor of the French at the same time represented that Austria was within a few hours march of an enormous Russian army. England and France were remote from such a danger, and it was therefore desirable to enter into a compact guaranteeing to Austria the assistance of the two Powers in the event of any attack by Russia. That was an extremely fair and reasonable proposal. It was worthy of remark that the Government had not given the House the correspondence with the Cabinets of the Tuileries and Vienna on the subject of this identical note. It was, however, of great importance, because, as the note was not sent and no joint action took place, the question arose how Parliament was to know which of the three Powers refused to take this joint action. A paragraph, which appeared to come from an official source, appeared during the recess in The Times newspaper on the 15th of August, 1863. It was as follows:—

"Russia and Poland.—The three despatches in reply to Prince Gortschakoff from Austria, France, and Great Britain will probably reach St. Petersburg this day, and will be presented at once to Prince Gortschakoff. England and Austria objected to an identical note, as proposed by France, because they considered it would too much resemble a menace to Russia. As it is, each Power has contented itself with replying to the arguments addressed to it by Russia."

Beyond this statement the House of Commons had not received the least information as to this identical note, although it was the turning point of the whole negotiation. It was supposed from the statement in The Times that the identical note was refused both by Austria and England. This, however, was not correct. The fact was that the identical note was drawn up by Count Rechberg, and was then submitted to the Governments of France and England. The latter Government refused to agree to the identical note, or to enter into any further combinations, and Earl Russell expressed his intention to pursue in future an isolated policy. On the 3rd of August, in last year, M. Drouyn de Lhuys, writing to the French Ambassador, the Duc de Grammont, at Vienna, said—

“I do not propose to recur to-day to the considerations which pleaded in favour of a complete identity of language in the replies of the three Courts to the communications of Russia. Our reasons—I have pleasure in saying so—have been thoroughly appreciated at Vienna; and I consider it my duty to acknowledge that it is not the fault of the Austrian Government that our proposition was not adopted. It was inspired, not only by the desire of augmenting the authority of our proceedings in giving to the Russian Cabinet a proof of the unity of views, which it has seemed to doubt, but, also, by the sentiment of the peculiar situation of Austria, to whom we thought it right to guarantee that we intended to share with her the consequences of a common policy. Our proposition not having been accepted in London, I have prepared the separate despatch, which our Ambassador at St. Petersburg will be instructed to deliver to Prince Gortschakoff. I enclose it herein, with the English draft, which has been communicated to me by Lord Cowley. The conclusion of these two documents reproduces the last paragraphs of the draft originally proposed by the Vienna Cabinet. We desire that at least this partial identity may be maintained.”

The Foreign Minister of France, writing to the French Chargé d’Affaires in London, on the 22nd of September, 1863, said—

“We have not changed our opinion concerning the European character of the Polish question, and concerning the rights which the general interest and treaties confer upon us. We deplore the circumstances that three Powers like England, Austria, and France, have not resolved on giving to their proceedings all the efficacy desirable, and the responsibility of assuring to their opinion the irresistible authority of a collective resolution does not rest on our shoulders.”

Neither the Emperor of the French nor the Emperor of Austria was therefore to blame for the failure of the diplomacy of the Western Governments. He could not say thus much of the diplomacy of Austria without also adverting to the conduct of the Austrian Executive at the present moment. While the diplomacy of Austria, following the Foreign policy of Lord Castlereagh, desired the independence of Poland, the Austrian Executive in Galicia imitated the cruelties of Mouravieff. Ladies whom he had himself seen tending the sick and wounded Poles in Cracow, were now in prison. One of these ladies was kept in solitary confinement, and her letters were not allowed to reach her. The Austrian Government punished these ladies for having assisted the sick and wounded Poles, but their sympathies were naturally with the insurgents. The noble Viscount was to blame for a good deal that had happened in the history of Poland. Since 1831, whenever Poland had had a chance, the noble Viscount had been in office, and had not done as much for her as he ought and could. One cause of this was the disregard he had always shown for public law. His maiden speech in this House, delivered on the 3rd of February, 1808, was against Denmark and in defence of the bombardment of Copenhagen by the British fleet, and he then laid down a principle of policy which had run more or less through his whole career as Foreign Minister. “There are times,” he said, “when the Law of Nations must be broken.” Now, he (Mr. Hennessy) maintained that the Law of Nations must always be upheld, and, if this had been done, Poland would not have been in her present deplorable condition. At Blairgowrie, Earl Russell, referring to the partition of Poland as an event which was a scandal to Europe and a reproach to the Three Powers who were parties to it, said that, by the Treaty of Vienna, Europe had given a retrospective sanction to the partition, and had become accessory after the fact; but, as Russia had not fulfilled the conditions under which her title was recognized, we were no longer bound to recognize her sovereignty in Poland. This was the substance of the Resolutions before the House. But the noble Earl was not satisfied with his declaration at Blairgowrie. Eight days before he made it, he was in communication with the French Government on the subject, and they were most desirous that the declaration should be made. Accordingly, in September, Earl Russell wrote a despatch to Russia, which was dated October 20, 1863, and embodied the Blairgowrie declaration. Lord Napier privately communicated its contents to Prince Gortschakoff, who said it was a very serious matter to declare before Europe that Russia had forfeited her sovereignty in Poland. Lord Napier telegraphed home Prince Gortschakoff’s opinion, and, at the same time, Count Bismark actually threatened to make it a casus belli if the despatch were read. The very day the English despatch was written, the French Government wrote to their Minister at St. Petersburg referring to it, stating that they were in accord with every word of it, and directed him to support it. But, after this despatch had received the approval of the Queen and Cabinet, Earl Russell recalled it, struck out the last sentence, which was the only one of importance, and it was afterwards delivered to the Russian Government. So bungling was the noble Earl's surgery that the scar could still be seen—the premisses were there, but he had removed the conclusion. The value of such a declaration, had it been made, could hardly be overrated, and the Poles looked for it with anxiety. It did not mean war. Count Bismark, indeed, might threaten war; but, though he had made war on a weak Power, it was doubtful whether Count Bismark would make war on England. The noble Viscount had stated, on a former occasion, that to tell any country that we did not recognize her sovereignty where she was de facto sovereign, though there might be insurgents there, would occasion war. But, in the case of Circassia, the British Government had distinctly refused to recognize the sovereignty of Russia; and before Greece became independent, Count Nesselrode proposed that the British and the Russian Governments should jointly declare to Turkey that they did not recognize Turkish rule in Greece. Remembering these precedents, and looking at what England had done and omitted to do in Poland, the least which the House of Commons could ask was that the declaration made by the Foreign Minister and inserted in a despatch should be made by the Government. Diplomatically, the Blairgowrie declaration possessed no value. Foreign Governments were not bound to know anything about it. But not so the subjects of the Queen, who, when the Foreign Minister stated in public that Russia had forfeited her title to sovereignty in Poland, were bound to look upon that forfeiture as having been declared with authority. Poland of to-day was Poland within the limits of 1772; and there was something more which made this question a practical one. What were the influences, and who were the parties, that determined the future destinies of Europe? From time almost immemorial, the destinies of Europe had been swayed by two great parties—the revolutionary and what, without reference to the political divisions of parties in this country, might be called the Conservative party. There was a third influence which had modified these two on the Continent of Europe. A house or family—at one time the House of Hapsburg, at another the House of Bourbon. For the latter we had now the House of Napoleon. And what was the attitude of those three great parties? The revolutionary party, as represented by a disinterested soldier who had recently received an enthusiastic reception in this country, had declared that Poland must be revived. The Conservative party at the other end of Europe had made a similar declaration; and, judging by the information which was in the possession of the public at large, he thought he was entitled to say that the Emperor of the French also was in favour of Poland. The growing greatness of Spain, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken of as one of the great facts of the day, the kingdom of Italy, and the establishment of the Empire of Mexico, were each of them owing to the combined action of some two of the three parties to whom he had alluded. Keeping the fact in view, remembering what were the sentiments of all three as regarded Poland, and having regard to the fact that every man of intelligence, education, and property in that country was in favour of its independence, certainly he did not despair of Poland. After the insurrection of 1831, the Emperor Nicholas tried the effect of banishments to Siberia, and issued ukases under which male children were taken from their country to be reared up in Russia; and yet, notwithstanding all that, the insurrection of 1831 was in the present day vindicated by a generation then unborn. The consistency with which the men of Poland had resisted foreign oppression was due to the heroism of her daughters. At an historic place near this metropolis, the beauty and rank of England were gathered round tables on which the jewels of the women of Poland were displayed for sale at a fancy fair held in aid of their country. On those tables were to be seen the tiaras of princesses, the diamonds of noble ladies, and the less costly ornaments of humble, but not less heroic and patriotic women. The inscriptions on many of those articles told their own tale:—"A birthday gift from a brother;" "A wedding present from a father." And there were memorials even more touching and instructive than all those diamonds. There were the offerings of women who, having sold their jewels to equip their husbands for the field, now, when those husbands had fallen, parted with the last memento of their married life, and sent their wedding rings here to be sold for the benefit of the wounded. It was creditable to the leaders of fashion in England that, when the great ladies of the land were gathered around those tables, and when they looked at those wedding rings, tears started from the eyes of many of them. The women of England had paid that tribute—that tribute in kind to the sorrows of the women of Poland. When would the statesmen and soldiers of Europe pay a tribute in kind to the statesmen and soldiers of Poland? The Emperor Napoleon, Edmund Burke, Metternich, Talleyrand, Lord Castlereagh, and other eminent statesmen, had all declared an independent Poland to be inevitable. The records of the opinions of such men were full of hope; but there were also in favour of that nation less perishable records—records written in the hearts of the people of Europe; and as long as he believed in the existence of a sense of public right in the heart of man, he should refuse to despair of Poland. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving his first Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the negotiations of Her Majesty's Government respecting Poland have not terminated in a satisfactory manner,"—(Mr. Hennessy),—instead thereof.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, though there are certainly many things in the speech of the hon. Gentleman in which I agree, yet I cannot concur with him in the conclusion at which he arrived; and I certainly shall vote for the Motion for going into Supply, instead of for the hon. Member's Resolution. I shall not follow the hon. Member through the historical details of the earlier history of the Polish nation. I agree with him in the condemnation he has passed on that great European crime, the partition of Poland; and it is almost needless to say that I concur in the censure and condemnation which he has passed on the conduct of Russia throughout the whole of her connection with Poland. On that part of his speech I might make a well known remark, but inverting the sentiment, Quis vituperavit Herculem?—and say, who has excused, palliated, or justified the conduct of the Russian Government? But that is not the question on which the House this evening is called to give an opinion. The hon. Gentleman condemns the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in their recent transactions with regard to Poland. I do not intend to revert to those former periods to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, because they have in reality nothing to do with the question at issue. Though I agree with what the hon. Gentleman says in his Resolution—that the efforts which Her Majesty's Government have made in behalf of Poland have not been successful—yet I am at a loss to understand from the hon. Gentleman what it is that we have not done which he thinks we ought to have done. He says it is our fault that we have not been more successful in regard to Poland; but I appeal to the memory of the hon. Gentleman himself to say whether, in the course of last year and the year before, when he was urging us to exert the influence of Great Britain in favour of Poland, he did not repeatedly say that he did not ask for war, that he did not ask for the display of arms, he wanted only diplomatic assistance, and especially, he said, he wished that the diplomatic influence of England should be exerted to obtain from all the principal Powers of Europe a concurrent opinion with ourselves as to the duty which Russia owed towards Poland, and as to the violation of her engagements at the Treaty of Vienna. Well, we did all that the hon. Gentleman asked us to do—we went to the utmost extent and length of diplomatic exertions. We did succeed in getting most of the leading Powers of Europe to concur with us in urging at St. Petersburg the manner in which Russia had failed to perform her engagements contained in the Treaty of 1815, and in exhorting her to fulfil those engagements, and to deal in a different manner with the Poles. What was the next step then which we had to take? Only two things remained to be done. One was to cease those representations which, however respectable and powerful the quarters from which they came, had not been attended with success; and the other was to do what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) said would have been an act of insanity—to go to war with Russia on account of Poland. We were not insane, and we did not at any moment contemplate going to war with Russia for the sake of Poland. My noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs stated that from his place in Parliament on more than one occasion. There are many reasons why it would have been an act of madness to venture on such a war. The hon. Gentleman said that on one occasion we declined the co-operation of Austria and France in favour of Poland. Why, Sir, he afterwards mentioned with condemnation the conduct which Austria is now pursuing with regard to the Poles in Galicia. Is it likely, Sir, that Austria having Galicia, and Prussia having Posen, both of which are occupied by fragments of the Polish nation, would have concurred in attacking Russia, and compelling her to perform engagements which, in point of fact, they had no great interest in asserting on behalf of the Poles. Sir, it would have been impossible. Then, with regard to France. For many years the French Legislature passed annually resolutions somewhat similar to that which the hon. Gentleman now proposes to us to pass, but at last they felt that they were placing themselves in an undignified position by expressing opinions which were not to be followed up by any practical acts on the part of the executive Government, and they therefore abstained from doing so. If the hon. Gentleman asks me whether in my opinion Russia has, in point of fact, not forfeited the right which by the Treaty of Vienna she obtained to Poland, because she has not fulfilled the corresponding engagements imposed on her by that treaty, I should be very much disposed to agree with the hon. Gentleman. But I say it would be undignified for this House formally to pronounce such an opinion unless this House was prepared to follow it up by an address to the Crown to give effect to the declaration which they had made. If we were prepared to go to war to-morrow and to follow up the sentence of forfeiture by execution, either singly or in conjunction with any other Power; if we were ready to go to Poland and say to Russia, "Not only have you forfeited your right to Poland, but we mean to take away from you that territory to which you no longer have a European right,"—I could understand the propriety of coming to such a decision, if the House were convinced that it was founded on justice and right. But to pronounce such an opinion without being prepared to act up to it would be placing this House not only in an undignified, but I will say a ridiculous position. But has this country a right to deal singly with this matter? Does Russia possess Poland simply by a treaty concluded between England and Russia? By no means. The Treaty of Vienna, by which the Duchy of Warsaw was given to Russia, was signed by eight European Powers—not only by England, but by France, Austria, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, and Sweden. England alone has no right to abrogate any part of that treaty which she thinks may have been broken by one of the Powers parties to it. A declaration, therefore, by England alone would not have any validity to put an end to the right of Russia, independently of the circumstances that it would be most undignified on the part of this House to pronounce an opinion of that sort, unless we were prepared to give effect to it in some practical way. The hon. Gentleman says the Poles are most anxious that this House should pronounce such an opinion. If that be so, then I must say the Poles are very shortsighted with regard to their own interests. What happened after the insurrection of 1832? That insurrection was suppressed by the arms of Russia and by the passive co-operation of Prussia. We remonstrated with the Russian Government for abolishing the Constitution which the Emperor Alexander had granted to Poland. What was the reply of the Emperor of that day? He said, "You have no right to appeal to the Treaty of Vienna. I don't hold Poland in virtue of that treaty; I hold Poland by the sword. I have conquered it: it is mine, not by treaty, but by the right of conquest; it revolted and I subdued it; and you have no more right to talk of my treatment of the inhabitants of Poland than of any other part of my dominions." We gained a step—a considerable step, I think, in our recent negotiations, when, in deference to the collective opinion of Europe, the Russian Government admitted that they held Poland by virtue of the Treaty of Vienna, and that they were bound by the engagements which Russia took towards Poland under the stipulations of that treaty. They said, "We acknowledge that we are bound by those engagements; we cannot fulfil them while this insurrection lasts; but when order and tranquillity are restored we will do that which we admit we are bound to do under the Treaty of Vienna." That is a much better position for the Poles to be in than if we were to say to Russia, "We will not accept your admission; we go back to your declaration of 1832; we say that you hold Poland by conquest independent of any treaty; and we leave you therefore at liberty to deal with it as you please—we give the Poles up to your tender mercies, to be treated in such a manner as you may think fit." To the well-understood interests of the Poles such a declaration as the hon. Gentleman asks this House to make would be as injurious as anything this House could do with respect to the Polish question at the present moment. I hope, therefore, that, notwithstanding the hon. Gentleman's eloquence, notwithstanding all the statements he has made, and justly made, as to the wrongs which Poland has sustained at all times, and particularly as to the cruel injuries recently inflicted on her by the agents of the Russian Government, this House will not be led away by their feelings, and will not, in a manner which their better reason would forbid, take away from the Poles the only remaining diplomatic protection which the Treaty of Vienna gives them, which, good or bad, effective or not, is still a diplomatic shelter, and throw them back into the condition the Russian Government asserted they were in after the close of the rebellion or the war, I may more properly call it, of 1831-2. The hon. Gentleman has said, and has said truly, that the Poles have manifested a degree of national feeling, of attachment to their country, powers of endurance, and a courage and intrepidity, almost unexampled in the history of any other nation. But the more, in my opinion, we admire the Poles the less disposed ought we to be to agree to these Resolutions; the more we think them deserving the sympathy of Europe the less ought we to deprive them of that diplomatic and political protection which I maintain the Treaty of Vienna still affords them, and the force of which we are entitled to expect the Russian Government will, at some future period at all events, in some degree acknowledge by its conduct. I concur with the hon. Gentleman, as I am sure all who heard him must do, in the opinions which he has expressed in reference to the conduct of Russia, but then I cannot agree with him in the conclusions at which he has arrived. He mentioned two instances in support of his Motion: the one being the declaration which we made to Russia that we did not acknowledge her sovereignty in Circassia; the other the representation which we made to Turkey, to the effect that we did not acknowledge her dominion over Greece. Now, I would ask with respect to the first of those instances, What is the position of Circassia now? Has our declaration saved Circassia from being conquered by Russia? Are there not at this moment hundreds of thousands of Circassians who have been expelled from their country by Russia, receiving refuge in Turkey, and exposed to every possible misery and privation? Has not actual dominion over Circassia been established by the success of Russian arms? Does the hon. Gentleman think it desirable that the same consequences should follow a similar declaration in the case of Poland? Are we now to tell Russia that we do not acknowledge her dominion in that country, and are we to look on while she extends that dominion with the same firmness as in Circassia? The example of Circassia does not, I confess, seem to me to be a very encouraging one for this House to act upon, while, with respect to the case of Greece, I would observe that if Poland were as accessible to England and France as Greece was to England and Russia and France, and if England and France had the same means of rescuing Poland from Russia that England and Russia and France had of rescuing Greece from Turkey, there then might be some force in the hon. Gentleman's illustration, and a declaration of forfeiture might be easily followed by execution. The case of Poland, however, is entirely different from that of Greece, and, therefore, the example which the hon. Gentleman has given us seems to me to have no bearing on the conclusion at which he has arrived. I would, in conclusion, entreat the House, both out of regard for its own dignity and character, as well as for the sake of the best interests of the Poles themselves, of whose cause the hon. Gentleman is so able and consistent an advocate, to agree to the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, and not to give its assent to his Amendment.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that the Question which was submitted to-night did not turn upon the past history of Poland. It was simply whether the House should or should not agree to the Resolutions which the hon. Gentleman had put upon the paper. With regard to the Resolutions, they might agree as individuals that they were correct; but it was another question whether the House of Commons would do wisely in giving them their solemn sanction. He could not see what good could emanate from the passing of those Resolutions. He was told on his visit even by Polish authorities, that the insurrection was extinguished, and every day it was attempted to be excited only gave Russia additional opportunity of intensifying the subjugation and misery of Poland. He thought the time would come when Poland would have free institutions given her by the Liberal party who were now growing up in Russia.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, the argument used by the noble Lord, that great injury would be done to the Poles if they were deprived of the diplomatic protection afforded by the Treaty of Vienna had been refuted a thousand times by every act of cruelty which the Russian Government, notwithstanding all remonstrances, inflicted on Poland. The Russian Government had shown in the plainest manner by their conduct that that protection was utterly worthless in their eyes.

MR. SCULLY said, that while standing below the Bar of that House he had heard a statement which had brought him back to his place. He was told that there was to be no division upon the Motion, but he took occasion to say that he should certainly have a division. He, like other hon. Members, had received a circular asking him to attend the House for a certain division. He had given up every engagement in order that he might be present, and he thought that they ought to have a division, if division there could be upon such absolute truisms as were expressed in those Resolutions.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he hoped that the House would allow him to offer a few observations, because the noble Lord at the head of the Government had made a speech which, though in some respects satisfactory, in others deserved and claimed the notice of the House. His hon. Friend the Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) had made statements and referred to documents respecting which the noble Lord, addressing the House upon this important subject, had preserved the most studied silence. One statement was that in 1861 the noble Lord was asked whether, at the time of the Crimean war, any Correspondence passed between the French or Austrian Governments and Her Majesty's Government with reference to the re-constitution of the Kingdom of Poland, and the noble Lord distinctly stated in the face of the Commons of England that there was no such Correspondence. The hon. Member had that evening referred to despatches which then passed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: French despatches.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: French despatches addressed to this country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: To the French Ambassador, not to the Government.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: But quoting the opinions of Her Majesty's Government, and quoting statements made by the representative of Her Majesty in Paris. The hon. Member for the King's County had quoted those despatches, and yet the noble Lord did not for a moment attempt to explain how it was that in 1861 he made a statement which the despatches which the hon. Gentleman had now read proved to have been inaccurate. [Viscount PALMERSTON: Not at all.] The noble Lord represented the question as being whether there were any despatches from Her Majesty's Government. The question was this—and a most important question it was—whether at the time of the Crimean war any propositions were made by France and Austria, or any communication addressed to Her Majesty's Government, upon the subject of the reconstruction of the Kingdom of Poland. In 1861 the noble Lord distinctly denied that; and, as far as the House could judge at that moment, that statement of the noble Lord was not accurate. That was a matter which deserved notice and required explanation from some other Member of the Government. But there was another point to which the hon. Member for the King's County had referred. He had stated that after the speech made by the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, in the course of last autumn, at Blairgowrie, a despatch was written by him, and forwarded to Paris, to Vienna, and even to St. Petersburg, and was in the hands of our Minister there, which contained the very declaration which the hon. Member now wished to have repeated by the House of Commons, but that it was withdrawn because our Ambassador was told that the consequences of its presentation might be serious. Surely such a statement was not one to be passed over in silence by the head of the Government. A declaration made upon the authority of the Cabinet, with the assent of the Sovereign, communicated to the other Powers of Europe, and then withdrawn because our Government was informed that the consequences might be serious! Was the statement of such a fact to be made in the House of Commons, in the presence of the noble Lord, and to be passed over in silence? Having pointed out those two circumstances, which he thought ought to be explained by some Member of the Cabinet, he wished to draw the attention of the House to one or two other observations of the noble Lord. The noble Lord said that the speech of the hon. Member for the King's County admitted that the Government had done everything that they could, except that they did not go to war, which, said the noble Lord, was never suggested by any one, and certainly would not have met with the support of the House. That was not the statement of the hon. Member for the King's County. The statement of the hon. Gentleman was that the Government did not do all that they could; and, more than that, that when the Governments of Austria and Prussia were prepared to take another position, their action was paralyzed by the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to concur with them. The hon. Gentleman had pointed out—and the noble Lord made no reference to that part of his speech—that it was proposed by the Government of France that an identical note should be addressed by the three Governments to Russia, that that course was assented to by Austria, and the note prepared by her Minister, but its adoption was prevented by the refusal of England. When, therefore, the noble Lord said that the Government had done everything that they could have done, it was shown that he was endeavouring to throw dust in the eyes of the House, and to make them forget the statements of the hon. Member for the King's County. He offered no explanation why it was that, when there was this combined action on the part of the Continental Powers, when Austria herself was willing to take that course, he and his Government paralyzed the action of those Powers, and prevented that interference on behalf of Poland which but for their resistance would have taken place. Even as far as that declaration was concerned the noble Lord's Government did not do all that they could. It was true that they sent it to St. Petersburg, but they brought it back again, and, as far as the House knew from the documents which were published, the very declaration which was described by M. Drouyn de Lhuys as being in his opinion, and that of the Government of the Emperor, the most important step that could be taken by the Governments of Europe in this question was prevented by the noble Lord and his

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald

Government. The noble Lord said that it would be very unbecoming and injurious for this country to assent to such a declaration of forfeiture as this. But surely if the arguments of the noble Lord against such a declaration being made by a Resolution of that House were good, they applied with far more force to that declaration to which the noble Lord consented, which was made upon the authority of the Government and assented to by the Sovereign. Surely if it was now against the interest of the Poles to deprive them of the protection—the protection, forsooth—of the Treaty of Vienna—much protection it had been to them during the late unhappy months—the same objection would apply with still more force to the declaration made by the noble Lord and his Cabinet. But when the noble Lord told the House of Commons that it was contrary to the dignity of this country to hold language which we were not prepared to follow up by energetic measures, he would ask the noble Lord to consider what the Government had been doing in the case of Denmark for the last six or seven months. Talk of strong language—talk of menaces of war, and that it was contrary to the dignity of this country to hold such language unless we were prepared to support it! The last Minister who ought to make such a declaration was the noble Lord himself, who was at the head of a Government which had been using bullying language. ["No, no!" and "Hear, hear!"] The noble Lord might jeer; but if that expressed his opinion it did not express the opinions of the people of England or of the Members of that House. He said that a Government which had been holding the language which the noble Lord's Government had to the Governments of Germany for the last six months was the last that ought to make the statement that it was contrary to the honour and dignity of this country to use language which we were not prepared to support by force. He understood that it was not the intention of his hon. Friend to take a division upon the Resolutions which he had placed before the House, resting satisfied with the declaration which had been obtained from the noble Lord in his place in Parliament, and speaking as Prime Minister, in corroboration of the statement made by the noble Lord his Colleague in Scotland in the month of September last. His hon. Friend might well rest satisfied with having urged upon the Government the rights and the claims of Poland when his arguments had received the cordial and sympathetic assent of the House.

MR. LAYARD said, he would not detain the House many minutes, but he wished to set hon. Members right on one or two matters of fact. The hon. Gentleman opposite had used very strong language, but it was easy to do so when speaking without any sense of responsibility. If he were asked to point out what the Government ought to have done, or what he would have done himself in the same position, he doubted very much whether the hon. Gentleman would have carried his views to the extent of going to war with Russia on account of Poland.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD desired to say that he had never contemplated anything of the kind.

MR. LAYARD said, there was no other meaning to be deduced from his arguments. Except to take up arms on behalf of Poland, there was nothing the Government had not done. Over and over again, in the case of Denmark, of Poland, and of Italy, the Government had been twitted with not going to war in support of their views. The Government, on the contrary, believed that the country was not prepared for war, and did not wish for it; and the country, he was sure, gave the Government credit for keeping them out of war. As regarded the despatch so much relied on, it was perfectly true that England, France, and Austria had been acting together in the matter of Poland, and that the joint despatch was prepared which had been read by the hon. Gentleman; but though the French Government agreed to that despatch, the hon. Gentleman was completely mistaken in stating that the Austrian Government had ever agreed to it.

MR. HENNESSY: I must beg to disclaim the statement. I stated that the joint despatch was agreed to, supported by the French Government, and sent to St. Petersburg.

MR. LAYARD said, the hon. Gentleman opposite undoubtedly stated that Austria was one of the three parties agreeing to the despatch. But, in point of fact, it was Austria, and not England, which objected to a particular passage. The hon. Gentleman twitted him, over and over again, with failing to produce the despatch. But it was not in his power to produce a despatch which had never been acted upon nor communicated to the Russian Government, and which had been cancelled, and consequently had no existence. The hon. Gentleman knew that it was a very common practice, in order to save time, to send on a despatch which was not delivered till all the parties concerned had agreed upon it. If afterwards the despatch was not agreed to, it was simply cancelled. The cancelled despatch, which was never delivered, had no existence, but the despatch actually presented to the Russian Government was included in the Correspondence laid before Parliament. The hon. Gentleman objected to the last paragraph of that despatch as differing materially from the one originally contemplated, but for his part he thought it conveyed almost as much as the hon. Gentleman alleged to have been left out. The inference to be drawn from the statement that the rights of Poland were contained in the same instrument which conferred the Emperor's title to be King of Poland plainly was, that if Russia violated the engagements and duties imposed on her by that document she forfeited her title to rule over the nation. As regarded identity of communication, the House must recollect the meaning of the term. First of all, it was very difficult to get several persons to agree to a precise form of words, but when the words were agreed upon in a communication of such a solemn and important character, if their representations were not attended to, it threw upon the Powers who combined for this purpose the responsibility of taking measures to enforce attention to their views. The British Government thought it better not to make such a communication, but to make separate representations which, though not identical in language, should be identical in effect. The despatch to which the hon. Gentleman had so frequently alluded had, in fact, no existence; it had been cancelled; and the despatch laid on the table was that which had been communicated to the Russian Government. That was the whole history of the despatch of which so much had been made, and the House would see how entirely hon. Gentlemen had been misinformed.

MR. HENNESSY said that, after what had passed, he did not wish to press the Motion to a division.

MISCELLANEOUS CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he had been long of opinion that the present system of dealing with the Estimates, especially those of the Civil Service, was most unsatisfactory. The number of hon. Members attending when those Estimates were under discussion was always limited, and still fewer took any part in the discussions upon them. It was too late to move that the Estimates generally for the present year be referred to a Select Committee, which would be the most satisfactory method of investigating them; but there were one or two special classes as to which an exceptional course might and ought to be taken. It should be remembered that whatever increase took place on the annual Estimates, except with regard to exceptional items like the Prince of Wales's marriage, or the monument to the Prince Consort, became a permanent source of increase. That increase had jumped up £50,000 during the present year. It was very desirable that the various items should undergo preliminary examination by a Select Committee. He confidently felt that the time had come when the House ought to adopt a different system than the present for the examination of the Estimates. A Committee of the Whole House scarcely ever carried a reduction in the Estimates, though he believed that they did much good in discussing the Estimates generally, yet it was very difficult to follow up such in minute particulars in a large assembly. If a Select Committee were appointed to examine Class No. 2, they might in the meantime in Committee of the Whole House proceed with the other classes. It might be objected that such a Committee would diminish Ministerial responsibility, but that responsibility was a perfect myth, because under the present system, as soon as the House adopted the Estimates, the responsibility of the Government was at an end. He should conclude by moving—

"That the Miscellaneous Civil Service Estimates, Class 2, laid upon the table of the House, be referred to a Select Committee to examine the same in reference to the past expenditure for the Civil Services, and to report to the House any reductions, better arrangement, or other particulars connected with that branch of the Public Expenditure which in their opinion deserve the attention of the House when the said Estimates are under their consideration.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY begged to second the Motion. He thought that every

hon. Gentleman must agree that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the present manner of examining the Estimates, and he believed that if the Motion of his hon. Friend were agreed to, it would be productive of great good. The recommendations of the Select Committee of 1860 had in many respects been carried into effect, and much good had resulted therefrom. He did not see that the responsibility of the Ministers would be one jot lessened whether the Estimates were examined by a Select Committee or by a Committee of the Whole House. He firmly believed that the more the accounts were examined the better the works would be executed.

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Member that the House having negatived the Amendment, and having affirmed that "the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," there was no room for the Motion of the hon. Member. The Question before the House at present was that he "do now leave the Chair."

MR. PEEL said, he could not help thinking that the House was likely to be disappointed if it expected any results from the Committee proposed by the hon. Member. The Committee of 1860 examined the most vulnerable of those Estimates—Class 1. They took evidence, but they were unable to agree upon any other recommendation than that the First Commissioner of Works should be a permanent officer of the Civil Service. In 1848 a Committee sat on the subject of miscellaneous expenditure, and they came to the conclusion that the best security for economy was the existence of a Government honestly bent on retrenchment and reduction. Any proposal, however, to refer the Estimates of the current year to a Committee was a step in the wrong direction, because the Committee, and not the Government, would in that case be regarded as responsible for the Estimates. The hon. Gentleman had not got over the difficulty as to time by limiting his proposal to the Votes comprised in Class 2. That class embraced all the Civil Departments of the Government, and if a Committee upstairs were to direct its attention to the reductions which should be made in those establishments, it was obvious that the inquiry could not be terminated before it would be necessary to pass the Estimates. He thought the hon. Gentleman ought to acknowledge that there was a reduction in the Estimates of this year, and that it was satisfactory as far as it went. That reduction was not to be explained away by saying that it was due to the omission of the extraordinary expenses which appeared in the Estimates of previous years. There was an average amount of extraordinary expenses included in the present Estimates. There were, for example, the charges for the building of the new Foreign Office and the Record Office. As to the increase of £56,000, to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded, it could easily be accounted for without imputing extravagance to the Government; £16,000 of it was a merely nominal charge for postages, which went back into the Exchequer; another £16,000 was required for the registry of births and deaths in Ireland, and £10,000 more was required for the inspectorate of fisheries in Ireland, the last two items constituting an increased charge for two new establishments created by Acts of Parliament passed in the last Session. After deducting those sums from the £56,000, they had a residue of £14,000, which was not more than the amount of the ordinary annual increment in the salaries of the different public offices.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought the reason given for not submitting those Estimates to a Select Committee was most incorrect as regarded the responsibility of the Government, because when the Estimates were agreed to, that responsibility was taken away. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would turn his attention to the subject, and direct that the Estimates should be laid before the House before the 1st of April in each year. He begged to call attention to the great inconvenience of voting money on account.

NAVY — SUPERANNUATION IN THE DOCKYARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished, before Mr. Speaker left the Chair, to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. A short time ago certain rules and regulations were issued for the control and management of the dockyards. One of those rules referred to the superannuation of officers over sixty years of age. It was reported that that rule was to be stringently applied in the dockyard at Devonport, and that all officers there over sixty would have to retire, whereas at Portsmouth, Chatham, and, he believed, other dockyards, a certain number of officers over sixty were to be retained. He wished to ask, Whether the rule is really to be applied stringently to all the dockyards, or whether any of them are to be excepted?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that by the Act of Parliament of 1859 all persons above the age of sixty were superannuated without any medical certificate; therefore, it was implied that persons above the age of sixty, unless reported to be still fully equal to the performance of their duties, were all liable to be superannuated. In the case of the dockyards, there had of late years been great stagnation owing to the establishments being so full, and there being so few vacancies amongst them, that there was scarcely an opportunity for the hired men getting on in the establishments. It was also felt very desirable in the dockyards that, in order to insure the great works being carried on with vigour and economy, that after a certain age all persons of the artificer class, no matter how worthy, should be superannuated, and the Admiralty decided that after the age of sixty all inferior officers and all artificers and labourers in Her Majesty's naval establishments should be superannuated, unless they were specially recommended by the superintendents as being men of very active habits and still thoroughly able to their work; but on arriving at the age of sixty-five they would be superannuated as a matter of course. This rule had been applied, not to Devonport alone, but to all the dockyards without any exception; and he could assure the hon. Gentleman that wherever superintendents of yards had stated that certain individuals were of peculiarly active habits, and were still able to do a good day's work, if they were under sixty-five, they had had an extended time in the service; but in all cases all persons on arriving at the age of sixty-five were superannuated as a matter of course.

MR. FERRAND begged to ask whether an order had not been recently issued and sent down to Devonport, directing that all the men above sixty, without any exception, should be superannuated? He had been told that several men, between the age of sixty and sixty-five, although well able to perform their duties, would be superannuated.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: That is not so.

SUPPLY—SUPPLEMENTARY NAVY
ESTIMATES.SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, in moving the supplementary Estimate for the pay of the navy, I need preface the proposal with but very few remarks. Hon. Gentlemen are, I believe, aware that from time to time there have been very strong representations made, both in this House and out of doors, as to the fact that the pay of the officers and seamen of some classes in the navy is not so generous or so adequate as it ought to be. Sir, we know that the navy have of late years had fewer opportunities for distinguishing themselves and enriching themselves with prize money than they had during the great European war; and from that circumstance, the general rewards which fall to the lot of the navy are certainly very inferior to what they used to be in the days of our forefathers. There are two sources of emolument which are almost wholly lost to the navy in modern days. The one is, as I have said, prize money; the other is the freight that was formerly received on the carriage of gold. In former times, we all took our turns on the principal foreign stations of carrying freights, by which a considerable addition was made to our incomes, but that system has now almost wholly disappeared. It is true we still get a certain amount of advantage occasionally from the capture of pirates and slavers, but, generally speaking, as appeared from the evidence taken before the Committee on Promotion and Retirement last year, the emoluments of the navy are very inferior to what they were in the days of our forefathers. This matter has not been wholly overlooked. From time to time we have made considerable additions to the pay of various classes, but still I believe I am only expressing the opinion of the Committee to which I have referred, when I say that the pay of many branches of the navy is not adequate. The Committee was not permitted by the order of reference to make any statement of that nature to the House, but every one of its members felt that this subject would again be brought under the notice of Parliament. Among the recommendations of the Committee was one for reducing the number of certain classes of officers. That recommendation we are now prepared to carry into effect, and I shall refer at length to this part of our scheme presently. Meanwhile, I wish to direct attention to the first Vote I have to propose, amounting to £55,266, being a proposed addition to the pay and allowances of certain classes of officers and others, to begin on the first of July next. The first thing I have to state is, that the proposed addition will extend to that valuable and magnificent body of men—the petty officers of the navy, who, at present, are not paid so highly as the same class of men in the merchant service. It is not intended to increase the pay of flag officers, but merely to make an addition to their allowances. In the case of flag officers and commodores of the first class commanding-in-chief on foreign stations, we propose to increase the allowances by £547 10s. per annum. Flag officers, not serving under the orders of a senior officer, and in charge of separate stations or squadrons, are to have their allowances increased by £365. Flag officers serving under the orders of a senior officer are to receive when at home an increase of £182 10s., and when on foreign stations £365. Flag officers superintending dockyards are to get an addition when at home of £547, and when abroad £182 10s. Commodores of the second class are to have an increase at home of £182 10s., and abroad £365. I now come to the pay and allowances of captains. Officers in command of ships now-a-days are put to great expense. They are often in company with foreign squadrons, and I must say that the naval officers of most foreign nations are better off than ours in the way of allowances. We have carefully looked into this matter, and we propose to increase the pay and allowances of captains commanding in the way I am about to explain. There are three distinct classes of captains in command of ships, who are entitled to different rates of pay. There are likewise different rates and allowances according to the class of ship commanded. I believe the existing system in that respect is generally approved in the navy; the only question is as to the amount. We propose, then, that captains of the first class commanding sea-going ships will receive an addition to their pay and allowances, ranging from £99 to £162. The same class of captains commanding harbour ships will receive an increase of £53. Captains of the second class in seagoing ships will have an addition of from £89 to £153, and in harbour ships of £44; captains of the third class in seagoing ships from £80 to £144, and in harbour ships of £34. One of the strongest points brought before us in the Committee last year was that commanders in command had insufficient pay; and, accordingly, we propose that they should receive an addition of £86 in seagoing and £63 in harbour ships; and likewise that commanders, as second in command in line-of-battle ships and large frigates, and commanders in the Coast-guard, should have a similar addition of £63. It was further stated that lieutenants in command were also underpaid, and to them we mean to give an increase of £50 a year in seagoing and £27 in harbour ships. The senior lieutenants of rated ships and troopships without commanders and of ships commanded by commanders are also to have a rise of £27. The gunnery lieutenants will by this scheme be divided into three classes. The first class are to have £45 additional, the second £27, and the third £9. As to the other lieutenants, there was no evidence, I think, to show that their pay was inadequate. I come now to a proposal to create a new class of officers, in distinct accordance with the recommendation of the Committee. The warrant officers complained that when they had got their warrants they had nothing further to look for, and that they could not become officers in a higher grade, such as lieutenants or commanders. It appeared, therefore, to the Committee that a superior class of warrant officers ought to be created; and in carrying out that recommendation, our object is to establish a rank to be attained not by mere seniority, but by energy, activity, and meritorious service on the part of warrant officers. These new officers are to be commissioned officers, and to be styled chief gunners, boat-swains, and carpenters, and are to receive £164 per annum. We propose to make twelve altogether among each of the three classes. That is a boon, the Committee will understand, not merely to the warrant officers, but generally to the seamen of the fleet from whom they are selected. We propose also to increase the pay of the warrant officers of the first class by £7, of the second by £6, and of the third by £4, in seagoing ships. In harbour ships the addition will be—first class £7, second class £12, and third class £9. I find I omitted to mention the sub-lieutenants. Their additional pay will be £24 a year. Then the inspectors of machinery are to have an increase of £36. In the full pay of the paymasters we propose an increase of £20; and also that effect should be given to the recommendation of the Committee, that these officers should rise in regard to half-pay by length of service, like other officers, and not, as hitherto, by classification. The assistant-paymasters in charge are to have an increase of £27, and the others an addition according to service, giving a mean of £18. We propose to give the naval instructors an increase of from £27 to £54, the mean being £41. The chief petty officers will have a rise of £3 per annum; the first class petty officers the same; and the third class £1 10s. These are the details of the scheme which I have to submit in regard to the full pay of the navy; and here, properly, I ought to close my statement on this Vote. It may, however, be convenient that I should now advert to the items of the other Vote of £5,775 for additional charge for altering and improving the system of retirement of officers of the navy, and reducing the number on the active list. I quite admit that it is immensely inconvenient that we should have so many lists of retired officers, but after very earnest consideration of the subject, we found that there were so many circumstances and so many classes of officers to be dealt with under various Orders in Council, that any attempt to put them in one single category as retired officers was quite out of the question. All we could do was to see whether there were any officers who, by any arrangement of the Order in Council of 1860, had been damaged in their circumstances, and, if so, to endeavour to rectify the matter. This leads me to a subject often adverted to in this House. Of course, as a naval officer, I could not but sympathize with any class of naval officers really aggrieved; and I am now about to advert to a grievance which has been very loudly complained of by certain officers affected by the Order in Council of 1860. I will endeavour presently to explain that Order in Council, but what I now wish clearly and distinctly to state is, that in the scheme I am about to propose I do not interfere with or alter in any way any classes of retirements existing previous to the Order in Council of 1860. One reason why I wish to make that clear is, because there is a distinction between that Order in Council and any previous Order in Council, inasmuch as that was the first instance of anything like compulsory retirement of captains. I will now explain what that Order in Council was. At the period when it was issued, our lists of superior officers in the navy were in a very unsatisfactory state. Promotion was almost stagnant, and our flag officers, though most gallant, were certainly not so efficient for active service as might have been wished. Consequently, it was then decided to place captains compulsorily on the retired list upon certain terms. Speaking now entirely of the half-pay active captains, I may here state that in the navy there are three classes of them. The first class receives 14*s.* 6*d.* a day, the second 12*s.* 6*d.*, and the third 10*s.* 6*d.* It was then decided, when the Order in Council of 1860 was issued, that captains arriving at the age of sixty should be retired compulsorily. Now, we excluded from that Order in Council the first class of captains entirely, because they were considered to be so near their flag that it was thought that it would be a matter of injustice to cut them off from the opportunity of arriving at it; but with regard to captains of the second and third classes the retirement was compulsory. They got an increase of pay, those receiving 12*s.* 6*d.* having their pay immediately increased up to 20*s.*, and those receiving 10*s.* 6*d.* having their pay increased to 18*s.*; but still they felt the arrangement as a grievance, because, as the first class captains would rise to the half-pay of rear admiral, 25*s.*, they thought they might with equal justice rise to the same amount of pay likewise. They undoubtedly got an immediate rise in pay, but they lost the chance of a further ultimate rise. That circumstance had been often adverted to in this House, and it had been stated that the officers felt it as a grievance; and we now propose to issue an Order in Council by which captains of the second class who have not completed their sea service shall, on arriving at the age of sixty, be retired on 20*s.* a day, as is the case at present, but that on arriving at their flag rank they shall receive 25*s.* a day. That is the increase we propose with respect to them. The captains of the third class who have not completed their sea service will, on arriving at the age of sixty, be retired on 18*s.* a day, as now, but on arriving at the flag list they will also receive 25*s.* a day. This proposal only extends to captains on the captains' list before the date of the Order in Council of 1860, with regard to whom it was said that injustice had been committed. In making this arrangement the Government thought that it would be unjust to withhold a boon from the commanders and lieutenants who, when retired compulsorily by the Order in Council of 1860, did not rise in pay. We propose that commanders and lieutenants, retired compulsorily under the Order in Council of 1860, are to rise in pay in their respective ranks as they would have done had they remained on the active lists of their ranks; and I trust that this will be considered satisfactory by those gallant officers. So much for the Order in Council of 1860; and now I have to propose a new scheme, with the view of carrying out the recommendations of the Committee to which I have referred—that the captains' list should be reduced to 300, and the commanders' list to 400. We propose to set about this in the following way. Those captains who have served one year at sea in their present rank, but who have not completed their term, may, on arriving at the age of fifty, with the consent of the Admiralty, and on arriving at the age of fifty-five may claim, and on arriving at the age of sixty must, under any circumstances, be retired on 20*s.* a day, to be increased to 25*s.* on arriving at the flag list. As soon, however, as the list is reduced to the number of 300, we do not propose to have the power of retiring officers at the age of fifty. With regard to the next class of captains, who have not served this one year, it is proposed that on arriving at the age of fifty they may with the consent of the Admiralty, and on arriving at the age of fifty-five they may on their claim, and on arriving at the age of sixty they must, under any circumstances, be retired at 18*s.* a day, which will be increased to 20*s.* on their arriving at the flag list. That, then, is the proposal which we have to lay before the Committee, with a view to the reduction of the captains' list from 350 to 300. And now I come to the last recommendation of the Committee—namely, that the commanders' list should be reduced from 450 to 400. The compulsory retirement of 1860 said this—that any officer who had not served within the last fifteen years should be included in that Order in Council. What we propose is that officers who have not served within ten years—which, of course, will include a greater number—shall be comprehended under that Order in Council. They will receive the rank of captains on reaching the age of sixty, or attaining fifteen years' seniority as commanders without increased pay. In addition to this we propose that a limited number of commanders, on arriving at the age of forty-five, may with the consent of the Admiralty be retired, at fifty-five may claim to be retired, and at sixty must, under any circumstances, be retired upon the same terms as I have already adverted to, with pay in proportion to their length of service. There is another recommendation of the Committee which, I am sorry to say, we cannot carry out. It suggested that the lieutenants should not exceed 1,000, or, in other words, that our lieutenants' list should be kept up to 1,000. But I am sorry to say it is far short of that number. What we propose is, that the establishment of lieutenants shall not exceed 1,000, and also—not with a view to the reduction of the list, which is too small already, but as a matter which was brought before us by the Committee of last year—that if from any circumstance lieutenants should be unable to rise in the service they should, on arriving at the age of forty-five, and having seen certain service, be allowed to retire. We propose, therefore, that lieutenants of forty-five, who have had fifteen years' service, may claim to be retired with the rank of commander, under the conditions prescribed by Order in Council of 1860—that is to say, their position as regards pay will depend, as with commanders, upon their length of service. I may state, likewise, that when they have been fifteen years on the lieutenants' list they may assume the rank of retired commanders, but that is not to carry with it any increase of pay. These are the proposals which I have to make to the Committee. There are two or three incidental matters which have been recommended by the Committee, to which I will now refer. We had evidence to the effect that the time served in the Coastguard had not received sufficient consideration. By the rules of the navy the time passed in the Coastguard counted only as one-third, and the Committee recommended that it should have a greater value. It is, therefore, proposed that in all calculations the time so passed shall count for one-half to officers retiring in future; and that, I think, will be found a considerable boon. There are various other recommendations, one of which, for instance, is that no officer should be promoted to the active flag rank who had not served three years at least in command of a bond fide sea-going ship. That is a very proper recommendation, and will be embodied in an Order in Council. I think I have now adverted to the principal recommendations of the Committee, and I have only to add that I am quite convinced, if hon. Members will entertain these proposals, they will confer a great boon on the navy generally; and, although I do not admit that the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) is right in maintaining that the officers of the navy are overpaid, I trust, if these proposals are agreed to, they will be satisfied.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £55,266, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for increasing the Full Pay of the Executive Officers, Paymasters and Assistant Paymasters, Naval Instructors, &c., and Petty Officers of the Royal Navy, which will come in course of payment during the nine months ending on the 31st day of March, 1865."

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he had listened with great attention to the speech of the noble Lord, and was filled with disappointment that no allusion had been made throughout the whole of that speech to a class of officers upon which the safety of the navy of England in a great measure depended, and who he had yet to learn had done anything to deprive them of the benefits which were to be conferred on their more fortunate brother officers—he alluded to the masters of the Royal Navy. That class of officers considered themselves very ill-used. In the year 1824 an Admiralty memorandum was issued authorizing the admission of second-class volunteers, and at the same time forming a new rating open to the merchant service; but instead of training those officers as seamen and navigators, every possible obstacle was, as a rule, thrown in their way, and they were sternly told that they were never to receive any higher pay than that of masters. That order remained in force seven or eight years, and brought many promising young men into the navy, but they soon retired in disgust. That was the first attempt at introducing a class of officers from the merchant service into the Royal Navy. In the Baltic campaigns of 1854 and 1855 the masters were again called into action, and before landing at Bomarsund a consultation of the masters serving in the fleet was held, and to their exertions our success was in a great measure due, as he had abundant evidence to prove. He did not wish to puff unduly the services of any one class of officers, but he thought he might fairly ask, that when the services and requirements of other classes were under consideration, the services and requirements of the masters should not pass unnoticed. On the 30th of June, 1863, Her Majesty issued an Order in Council conferring upon the masters who had served fifteen years the title of staff commander, but that carried with it no additional pay or honour. It was true that under certain circumstances a staff commander might receive additional pay if there should be no warrant officer on board, but that happened so seldom that it was not worth taking into consideration. That order appeared to give rank, but by its last paragraph it placed the staff commanders, in all instances, junior to the lieutenants; and all persons must feel that a man who had served with credit for many years might naturally consider himself aggrieved to find himself suddenly placed under the command of perhaps a mere lad. Then, of all the ship's crew, the staff commanders and masters alone seemed to be disqualified from receiving marks of Royal approbation for distinguished services. In illustration he would refer to the case of Mr. William Roberts, a master in the Royal Navy, who, during the Crimean war, commanded the Cyclops when in action, and performed equally distinguished services with other commanders of steamers, but was passed over unnoticed. The difference of pay between the staff commanders and masters, and the paymasters and surgeons, formed a just ground of complaint. The staff commanders and masters received on promotion £182 per annum, while the surgeons received £273, and paymasters £249. After ten years' service the staff commanders and masters received £237, while the surgeons received £328, and paymasters £349. After twenty years' service the staff commanders and masters received £328, surgeons £401, and paymasters £600. In the half-pay the same difference existed. Now, when the noble Lord proposed to do justice to various classes in the navy, it was hard that those meritorious officers of whom he was speaking should be forgotten. If those officers were not of a meritorious and deserving class it would be far better to abolish such class altogether. The arguments used by the staff commanders and masters of the Royal Navy seemed to him to be founded on common sense, and he hoped that the House of Commons on some future occasion would take their case into their consideration with a view to obtaining for them redress. They asked now that their pay should not be so disproportionate to that of the surgeons and other officers he had mentioned, that they should share in any increase of pay to be provided by the supplementary Estimate, that they should take seniority with lieutenants except when on active service, and should be as competent to receive marks of Royal approbation as any other class of officers in the navy. It appeared to him that it would be only fair play, and in accordance with the dictates of common sense, to remove the present injustice done them.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to bring under the notice of the Committee the claims of the warrant officers. He had received an address, signed by a large number of warrant officers, complaining of the stinted amount of their salaries, and of the small increase proposed to be made to their pay. They also commented upon the manner in which the Lords of the Admiralty proposed to create twelve new warrant officers of each class.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: We propose to create twelve chief warrant officers, twelve chief boatswains, and twelve chief carpenters; making altogether an addition of thirty-six chief warrant officers.

MR. FERRAND said, he was then to understand that there would be thirty-six new creations in a body of 1,200 warrant officers. What the warrant officers wished brought under the notice of the House was that they desired an increase of pay for increased services. They complained that at present an officer of twenty years in the first class received no more pay than one just promoted to that grade. They further complained of the maximum retiring pension, and prayed for increased pay instead, and also an increase in the widows' pensions of the first class, the present practice being that the widow who had been longest in the first class received no more than the widow of the third-class officer who had been promoted to a warrant officer. They requested him to place their claims before the Committee with due respect, believing that they were so moderate and reasonable that their justice would be admitted. He was delighted to hear the noble Lord say he had arrived at the conclusion that an increase of pay should be given to the officers of the navy, on account of the large increase of pay that had taken place in the merchant service. Unless some such step were taken by the noble Lord it would be impossible to maintain the Royal Navy in a proper state of efficiency.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he must congratulate the noble Lord on having introduced this proposal to raise the amount of the allowances to officers, for the condition of naval officers up to the present time had been so impoverished that it was absolutely necessary that the House should take some means for making the service more remunerative. He did not concur with him, however, in thinking that the distribution of the additional £60,000 was the best that could be adopted. The scale of pay to the officers of the navy was a matter which must emanate from the Ministers of the Crown. It was not a constitutional course for an independent Member to move an increase of pay; but he concurred in what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk), with respect to the pay of the masters. The case of the masters had been inquired into by the Admiralty, and had been before a Committee of that House; and though the justice of their claim could not be denied, no allowance was made to them in the present arrangement. It would have been more satisfactory if the particulars of the pay and allowances to flag officers had been set out on the paper which was in the hands of hon. Members. The increase in the table allowances to flag officers on foreign stations would not in all cases be sufficient; and instead of being fixed at £547, it would have been better to apportion the amount of the addition to the expenditure on the particular station. There were three very expensive and at the same time very important stations—the Mediterranean, the East Indies, and the West Indies and North America. It must be for the interest of the country that the best men should be sent to those stations; and yet he knew that certain officers had been requested to accept those commands, and had declined to do so because the pay and allowances were insufficient. He had made that statement on a former occasion, and had been met with a contradiction. Technically he was wrong. He supposed there had been no case in which any one of those commands had been refused by an officer after receipt of the official letter offering him the command; but the custom was for the First Lord to ascertain through his private secretary the wishes of an officer whom he desired to appoint to a command, and it was to refusals made in answer to private letters that he alluded on the former occasion. The command in the Mediterranean was one usually held by an Admiral or a Vice Admiral. Some time ago, to his own knowledge, two Vice Admirals were asked privately whether they would take that command, and both refused to do so. A Rear Admiral, who was now a Vice Admiral, subsequently accepted the command, after four flag officers had declined it. The command in the East Indies and China had been declined in the same way. Sir James Hope, who had just returned from the command, told a Committee that he had been spending nearly £7,000 a year during the whole time he was on the East India station. His pay and allowances from the Admiralty amounted to £2,500, in addition to which he had the East India allowance of £3,000 a year—making £5,500, and as he was a man of considerable private fortune he was able to spend more. Vice Admiral Kuper, who succeeded him in that command, lost the £3,000, the East India allowance, so that he had only £2,500 a year to support the position which it had cost his predecessor nearly £7,000 a year to maintain. The additional allowance of £547 was not enough in such a case as that. On the West India and North American command the pay and emoluments of the Admiral in command amounted in the year 1834 to £14,000. They were now only £3,000, and a commander-in-chief on that station who had not a private fortune could not perform his duty in a manner acceptable to the country, and calculated to uphold good relations with the officers of foreign nations. The Governor of Malta had a salary of £5,000 a year, with allowances which brought his official income up to nearly £6,000, and yet, though his emoluments were greater, his position was no higher than that of the commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean. The Governor of Gibraltar also had pay and allowances far exceeding those of the commander-in-chief. The discrepancy was still more marked in the East. He thought that instead of making a fixed allowance without reference to the station on which the admirals were to be employed, it would have been better if the Admiralty had taken into consideration the nature of the employment, and apportioned the allowance with reference to the demands likely to be made upon the officer. He hoped that during the recess the Admiralty would consider the matter, and before the next Estimate was laid on the table would be ready with a plan which would give admirals commanding fleets a rate of pay commensurate with the duties they had to perform, with the demands on their means, and calculated according to the importance of the stations on which their flags were hoisted. With regard to the home ports, the commander-in-chief at Portsmouth ought certainly to have some addition to his pay. He had much greater demands on his means than the commanders at Plymouth and the Nore. The nearness of Portsmouth to town and to the neighbourhood in which the Court usually was, threw upon the commander-in-chief expenses which had often been felt to be a heavy tax. The estimated increase of £365 per annum for the commodores must be a mistake, because the five commodores already appeared to have 10s. per day, so that the increase would only be £182 10s. The increase to the captains appeared very considerable on paper, but in reality no one would get it. A captain must be in the first-class and must command a first-class ship; but there were only two first-class ships afloat which had not admirals on board, and these were commanded by second-class captains. He did not agree that this mode of paying captains would be agreeable to the service. Officers desired that their pay and command money should all be made into pay; for, though it was quite true that no one could command a ship without spending far more than the command money, yet a captain liked to feel that he was spending the money out of his own pocket, and not a sum of money intrusted to him to be filtered through his fingers for the public service. He regretted that the Admiralty had not considered the question of ships' bands, small though it might be. The bandmen were paid as men, but the bandmaster was not paid. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: He is rated.] Yes, but he was sure his noble Friend, who was very fond of music, and who had an excellent band on board the Princess Royal, had not got the services of his bandmaster for the ship's rating. When a ship was commissioned the captain had to put his hand into his pocket for about £300 for instruments, he had to put the band into uniform, and to find some £40 a year for the bandmaster. And all this was only for about three years, when the instruments were dispersed and the band broken up, again to go through the same process in other ships. He hoped that some plan would be devised for the organization of bands, by which captains would be relieved from this heavy expense. He should be glad to hear how the gunnery lieutenants were to be divided into classes. If the first class was to be attained only through an examination so stringent that no one would pass it, then the advantages of this new plan were not likely to be very generally enjoyed. With regard to the increased pay to engineers, he believed there were only two chief engineers at present in a position to receive. Turning to the explanatory statement as to retired pay, he was glad to find that some few of the captains were at last to receive that consideration which was their due, and the plan for reducing the list would probably turn out to be a very fair one. He was also glad to hear that the case of the commanders and lieutenants was under the consideration of the Admiralty, while he regretted to find that no provision was made for any increase of half-pay. He would, in conclusion, appeal to his noble Friend to endeavour to procure during the recess the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of the pay of the navy, for he might be assured no Estimate such as that before the House could give complete satisfaction, seeing that whole classes of officers were overlooked. He could not, he might add, think that the proposal to give only half-time to officers serving in the Coastguard would be looked upon with favour, and he would suggest that, as had been recommended by a Committee of the House, the time should be raised to two-thirds. He would only say, further, that he concurred in much that had fallen from the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Ferrand) with respect to warrant officers.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, the Question before the Committee was the Vote of £55,256. He wished to know what necessity existed for the proposed increase of pay at a time when we were in a state of profound peace? As to the bands on board ship which had been mentioned, he believed they were totally unknown before the battles of the Nile and Trafalgar. All the increase was proposed to be for the officers, there was none for the hard-working sailor.

Mr. CORRY said, it had been the constant effort of the various Departments for many years to make the Estimates as intelligible as possible, but that he never saw Estimates which were less intelligible than those before the Committee. If it had not been for the lucid explanation of the "Explanatory Statement," which they had heard from the Secretary of the Admiralty, it would have been almost impossible to understand it, and in some respects it was inaccurate as well as obscure. He was not, however, disposed to "look a gift horse in the mouth," especially when he recollected that the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty had not, in the memorandum of last year, held out much encouragement that any increase would be made in the enrolments of certain classes of officers. He quite concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Devonport (Mr. Ferrand), and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay), in almost everything which had fallen from them with respect to the warrant officers, and also with respect to the emoluments of flag officers, both at home and abroad. Indeed, he considered it to be one of the greatest defects of the present scheme that it did not increase the allowances of the flag officers commanding in chief at the home ports, as well as those of flag officers on foreign stations. He had, on a previous occasion, stated that he knew a home port in which he believed no officer could hold a command without having a considerable private fortune. The station he had in his mind was Portsmouth, where the admiral was required, frequently by introductions from the Admiralty, to entertain foreigners and other persons of distinction. The same might be said in a lesser degree of Devonport, but Sheerness was a place to which nobody would go unless he was obliged, and which everyone left as soon as possible. He might state that he had, in order to test the accuracy of his own views on the subject, written to four distinguished admirals, friends of his, who had held commands in chief both at home and abroad, and that the answers which he had received were as follows. One of those officers said—

"Speaking from my own experience (on a foreign station), I spent more than the naval pay and allowances every year of the whole period of my command. The Portsmouth command is very expensive, from the increasing number of persons of rank and position—foreigners and others—who look for some notice from the commander-in-chief, and who, in many instances, are introduced by letter or otherwise to him. I endeavoured to keep expenditure within reasonable limits, but during the year when I had the pay and allowances of vice-admiral, my naval receipts were £2,697 18s. 11d., and my expenditure £3,384 3s. 0½d., or £686 4s. 1½d. more. I have carefully rejected payments unconnected with the necessities of my position, and I limited myself to one pair of carriage horses."

Another admiral, who had held command both at home and abroad, said—

"You surprise me by telling me that the proposed addition to the table money of commanders-in-chief does not include any advantage to those serving at the ports at home, as I apprehend those are the very officers whose tables are necessarily the most expensive, although in India the article of consumption cost more."

And he then goes on to say that his expenses at a home port so greatly exceeded his naval pay and allowances that if he had been without private means he could not have retained the command. Another officer said—

"I think the intended increase of table money on foreign stations very necessary, and by no means too much; but if it be required there, it is much more called for at the ports, where it is impossible to get out of the way by going to sea, and where you are continually called on to exercise hospitality which is unavoidable, and more especially so at Portsmouth and Plymouth. While in command abroad my expenses during my three years exceeded my pay and allowances by £1,200."

He then added that his expenses while commanding at a home port exceeded his pay and allowances by a considerably larger amount. A fourth admiral wrote—

"I object altogether to the principle on which our commanders-in-chief are paid, and the most remarkable inconsistency is at Portsmouth. I was very unexpectedly nominated to that command, and although my duties, as well as what was expected of me, were precisely the same as if I had been a full admiral, and Royal and other personages were constantly sent to partake of my hospitality, yet, because I was only a vice-admiral nearly £500 a year, including allowances, was cut off my salary, and the result was that at the termination of my command, I was several thousand pounds out of pocket."

He hoped that the several points urged in the course of the discussion would be taken into consideration by his noble Friend, and that among others he would not overlook the inadequate remuneration given to the commanders-in-chief of the home ports. He thought, too, that the full pay of lieutenants and commanders ought to be in some degree proportioned to their half-pay. This would be only in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioners of Naval and Military Inquiry in 1860, which was to the effect that, as an inducement to officers to seek active service, the amount of their full pay ought to be fixed in relation to that of their half-pay, but under the present arrangement, a lieutenant (unless entitled to an exceptional allowance) of nine or ten years sea service, and on the half-pay list of 9s. a day, would receive no higher an amount of full pay than a lieutenant just promoted to that rank, and on the half-pay of 4s. a day. His noble Friend had stated that all the meritorious officers of long standing were either in command, or serving as first, or as gunnery lieutenants; but he (Mr. Corry) thought that was a very invidious remark, and he believed that there were many excellent officers of long standing who were not serving in any of those capacities. But even if it were otherwise, it would not meet his argument, because he thought that, in addition to their special allowances, first lieutenants and gunnery lieutenants ought also to receive full pay, having some relation to the position they had earned, by service on the half-pay list. In the case of captains their command money varied according to the complements of their ships, but the amount of their pay depended on their position on the half-pay list, and he thought that lieutenants had a special claim to be treated on the same principle, because while captains rose to the higher rates of half-pay by seniority, they did so by actual service at sea. He was glad to hear that the Admiralty had at last consented to do an act of justice to the captains affected by the Order in Council of 1860, and he hoped that the same spirit would guide the Admiralty in dealing with the various grievances which had been pointed out in the course of this discussion.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he must complain that a small class of officers would receive no increase of pay by one of the arrangements proposed; but would, on the contrary, rather be deprived of a portion of what was already allotted to them. He alluded to the captains in the harbour ships, the Excellent, the Britannia, and the gunnery ships. At present the captain of the Excellent received £800 a year, and the captains of the Britannia and other harbour ships £700. It was, however, proposed that the salary of the former should vary from £691 to £819, and the latter from £591 to £719, so that although it was possible for them to receive an increase of £19, it was also possible that they might be deprived of £109. He regarded the arrangement proposed, with reference to captains on the retired and reserved lists, as a most extravagant one. It would really give some colour to the statement which had been made, that there was no service where an officer could do so little and get so much, or do so much and get so little.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, he approved generally of the proposals of the Government, but regretted that they did not go far enough. He could not understand how the noble Lord had overlooked the case of the masters, and hoped that their services would still be recognized by the making of some addition to their pay. If a system of age retirement was adopted at all it ought to be fully carried out, and not confined to a single rank, so that while a captain should be retired at sixty an admiral might remain on the active list till he was a hundred. It would no doubt cost a considerable sum so to extend the system, but he believed that the money would be well spent. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) said that if money was given to one service it ought to be given to all; but that argument would not apply until the pay of the navy had been raised to an equality with those of the army and the Civil Service, to both of which it was at present inferior.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished it to be distinctly understood that, although he should agree to the Vote, he did not approve the scheme which had been brought before the House, which he regarded as totally inadequate, delusive in itself, and, in fact, a complete and perfect sham. Since he had been in the House he had never seen a more awkwardly framed paper than that which had been laid upon the table to explain it, and nothing could more dispose him to regret the retirement of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) from the Admiralty than the appearance of such a wretched attempt at exposition. When he, three years ago, carried against the Government the appointment of a Select Committee to investigate the claims of the navy, he was told that he had done a most unconstitutional act; but on the 9th of February, 1773, Viscount Howe presented a petition from captains in the navy, praying for a reasonable increase of their half-pay; and it was, by a majority of 154 to 45, referred to a Committee. Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House had always contended that this question ought to be dealt with by the appointment of a Royal Commission; and the incongruities of this scheme were so numerous and so important, that such an inquiry could not long be refused. It was quite impossible that flag officers on foreign stations should exist upon their pay even with the addition which it was now proposed to make to it, and it was not seemly that officers should be called upon to contribute from their private means to the service of the State. A gallant admiral who had held the command of the China station told him that he could not exist upon less than £3,500 a year, and that to live like those with whom he associated would have cost him £5,000. There was not a clerk in any commercial establishment in China who was not better paid than a post captain, and there was not a man who went there who might not with prudence amass a large fortune in a few years. It would not be unfair that a trifling percentage should be levied upon the trade in those seas to remunerate the officers who wasted their lives and spent their fortunes in its protection. The flag in the East Indies was in exactly the same position. At present India enjoyed peace, unrestricted commerce, and other blessings, for which the Indian community was not called upon to pay one farthing, while the British taxpayer had to find the money, and the British officer was called upon to expend health, and even his private resources. The next subject was as to the lieutenants. The service might get on without admirals or captains, but not without lieutenants, who were the real executive officers, and therefore were entitled to consideration. It was alleged that the pay of lieutenants for the first two or three years after appointment was adequate, but that certainly would not be the case upon the China, East India, and Pacific stations. The main body of the lieutenants, who could not look for promotion under an average of ten years, remained at the same rate of pay; and as sometimes lieutenants at the age of thirty unfortunately married, it was hard to conceive how they could manage to live upon £182 a year. The recommendation in respect to those officers was an increase of pay every three years. Coming to the warrant officers, who, next to the lieutenants, were most important to the service, he found that their number was 1,200, and the Admiralty proposition was to give to 12 warrant officers of each class a trifling increase of pay. Thus, 36 warrant officers out of 1,200 were to receive 5*d.* a day additional with the rank of chief of their class. He had to complain that there was not an equal treatment of warrant officers in the navy with non-commissioned officers in the army. Thus in the recent

New Zealand war a sergeant in the army and a captain's coxswain in the navy, a petty officer, each obtained the Victoria Cross. The sergeant soon after was appointed to an ensigncy, and the coxswain was offered a warrant, which he from prudential reasons declined, as his acceptance of the offer would have placed him in a worse position. From his own experience upon the Commission for Manning the Navy in 1860, he could say that the opinion of the Commission was that the status of the warrant officers ought to be improved. How was it possible that the men who were the backbone of the navy could be expected in time of war to exert themselves to recruit our navy when no encouragement was held out to them? With respect to the engineers, the complaint of the inspectors of machinery who had sometimes a large amount of horse-power and many engineers under their supervision, was that they only received a guinea a day, while men of the same standing in the commercial marine received £1,000 or £1,200 a year. In conclusion, he would only repeat that he wished to guard himself from approving the paper before the House until a Royal Commission could be obtained to decide upon the merits of the question, instead of the Admiralty, taking advantage of a few observations of a Committee not appointed to consider the subject, adopting their own notions upon it.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he thought it scarcely consistent that in bringing forward so large a scheme as the present he should be taunted with wishing to stifle all the fair claims of the navy. He should be extremely happy if ever it fell to his lot to propose an increase of the pay of the navy, but at present he was doing all that lay in his power. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay), through misreading the paper which he had made the subject of comment, fell into two unintentional mistakes. The commanders of the second class, it was true, received 10*s.* a day, which had reference to their captain's commandment, but they also got £1 a day table money.

SIR JOHN HAY begged to ask whether he was to understand that they received both allowances?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Yes; £1 abroad, and 10*s.* at home. The additional allowance, moreover, to first lieutenants of ships commanded by commanders was 1*s.* 6*d.* a day, and not 6*d.*, as had been represented. His hon. and gallant Friend, he knew, was trusting to the statements of a very clever friend who prompted him on these occasions, but when he looked into the matter he would find that he had been misled. He admitted to his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone that Portsmouth was a very expensive station, but it must be borne in mind that flag officers in command at home were relieved from the necessity of keeping up double establishments, which formed the great tax upon officers engaged in active service abroad. He wished his right hon. Friend had not attributed to him an invidious remark with regard to lieutenants. As a matter of fact, more than half the lieutenants now employed were receiving extra allowances, either as senior lieutenants or as gunnery lieutenants, and that he thought was a very fair proportion. The invaluable class of officers on whose behalf the hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk) had spoken, were not included in the present scheme, but questions affecting their rank and position had been very recently dealt with. It was an old moot point in the navy, whether the rank of master ought to be maintained or done away with, and the discussion attained such dimensions that the Admiralty appointed a Committee to take evidence and report. The masters themselves, with few exceptions, were in favour, not of an increase of pay, but of rank; but some grievance having been brought forward as to the widows' pensions, they were increased by a subsequent Order in Council, and likewise fifteen out-pensions were given to these officers in Greenwich Hospital. The rank of staff captain and that of staff commander had likewise been created; but the main difficulty remained, and, for all he could see, must continue, and that was that the officer of the watch must always be in command on deck. In all social matters masters took rank according to the dates of their commissions. There was nothing in the regulations that he knew of to prevent staff commanders from being decorated with the Companionship of the Bath, but these were points affecting the prerogative of the Sovereign, and not properly falling under the cognizance of that House. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Berkeley) complained that officers on the retired list were paid higher than officers of the same rank on the active list. That, however, was always the case. The Admiralty was obliged to give officers some inducement to retire, and thus it happened that retired captains who could not be called upon for service were in certain cases receiving more than officers on the active list.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, that the noble Lord had either misunderstood him, or was not acquainted with the real state of the case. It was proposed that these particular captains when they became retired rear-admirals should receive the same pay as the active rear-admirals—namely, 25s. a day. That was far more than they ever applied for, and was unjust to all the officers on the active list. He should move for the reduction of the sum voted for retirement.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the officers who had been placed on the retired list under the Order in Council of 1860 were the second and third class of captains. They received by the present proposal as much as rear-admirals on the active list, but the latter could rise to the rank of vice and full admiral with corresponding rise in pay which they were debarred from.

CAPTAIN TALBOT said, he thought it had been shown by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) that admirals who were formerly in the receipt of batta and prize money, &c., were now placed in an inferior position to that which they formerly occupied. Their position was also inferior to that of the admirals in other services. He lamented that the noble Lord had not proposed some increase of pay for the masters. The noble Lord said he looked upon them as an invaluable class of officers, but it was extraordinary that in raising the rank of those officers he did not place them in a position to enjoy the rank that was given to them. He trusted that the Admiralty would give their best consideration to this subject, and also to the recommendation of the Select Committee of last year, that the pay of a lieutenant on full pay should be increased with length of service. Look at the position in which lieutenants on full pay were now placed. The noble Lord said that if an officer had a love or zeal for the service he would become a gunnery lieutenant or first lieutenant. [LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I said they can get up to it.] But the number of gunnery lieutenants and first lieutenants was limited. The consequence of the full pay not increasing with length of service was, that senior lieutenants of long service would in very many instances be receiving less emolument than junior gunnery lieutenants of very little service. Take an instance from a ship commanded by a captain with no commander. The first lieutenant with eleven years' service and the army rank of major received 10*s.* a day pay and an allowance of 2*s.* 6*d.*, making his total emolument 12*s.* 6*d.* The second lieutenant with eight years' service and the rank of major was receiving 10*s.* a day and no allowances; while the gunnery lieutenant with two years' service and the rank of captain was receiving 10*s.* pay, and allowances varying according to class, and amounting altogether either to 11*s.* 6*d.*, 12*s.* 6*d.*, or 13*s.* 6*d.* In another case of a ship commanded by a captain with a commander, the gunnery lieutenant with the army rank of captain and only three years' service was receiving 13*s.* 6*d.* a day against an officer of nine years' standing and with the rank of major, but who only received 10*s.* a day. These instances showed that long service and rank were not considered in regard to emolument. The injustice, however, would be at once removed if the pay increased with service, as recommended in the scheme of his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). He had received many communications on this subject, which he would assure the noble Lord was regarded with great interest by the lieutenants in the service. With respect to the active list, he considered it highly desirable that it should be reduced. If they expected officers to retire they must offer some inducement for them to do so; and the sum now proposed, among so large a number of officers, was totally insufficient for the purpose. The warrant officers of the navy were a most valuable class. Their services were most valuable, and their position should be made as good as possible. That was the goal to which sailors were encouraged to look, and he had over and over again known blue jackets to refuse a warrant when offered to them because they knew their position would not be improved. The pittance which was now offered to thirty-six warrant officers out of 1,200 was almost worthy of ridicule. There was another point which was viewed with great interest in the service—he meant the question of leave. When an officer came home, after being perhaps four years on an unhealthy foreign station, it was not too much that he should be allowed a few months' leave on full pay—he would say one month for every year of foreign service. That was already the case with regard to seamen. They had six weeks' or two months' leave, and it was essential to the happiness of officers that they should know a little of shore life. These questions were regarded with great interest in the service; and, acting in a spirit of fairness, he believed the intention of the Committee was to benefit the position of naval officers.

MR. LINDSAY said, he had no objection to the Vote, but was decidedly opposed to the mode in which it was proposed to apply it. The masters were a most valuable class, whose claims he had repeatedly urged on the attention of the Government; but although he had always been promised that their case would be considered, they were now passed over entirely. Paymasters, who had charge only of accounts and provisions, received double the pay of masters, who were responsible for the safe navigation of the ship; yet the former were by this scheme to receive additional pay, while the latter were passed over in silence. He begged to move that the Chairman report Progress, in order that the scheme might be reconsidered, and he hoped when next it was produced they would find it embraced the case of the masters and other points that had been urged in the course of the debate.

MR. CORRY begged to explain that his meaning, when he spoke, was that all classes of lieutenants should be paid according to their service.

COLONEL EDWARDS considered that the reserved captains had been treated with great injustice, and he hoped they would yet be placed in the position they deserved.

MR. FERRAND said, there were many widows of warrant officers living in the poorhouse of Devonport Union. If those persons had the pensions which they enjoyed formerly restored to them, that disgrace would be removed from the country.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE hoped that some explanation would be afforded in regard to the case of the reserved captains referred to by the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley (Colonel Edwards).

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the case of those officers had been disposed of. The boon had been granted to them.

COLONEL EDWARDS must say he was under a very different impression to that. He did not understand that redress had been given to those reserved captains, otherwise he should not have alluded to their case. Perhaps the noble Lord would state what were the further advantages which had been conceded to them.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could only repeat that they had granted them the boon. The officers now in question were those who retired under the Order in Council of 1860.

CAPTAIN TALBOT: The reserved captains on the "F.G." list.

COLONEL EDWARDS did not know what the list was called, but he referred to a meritorious class of officers who were put upon the reserved list a few years ago, and not allowed to rise to their flag as other officers did. They were excluded from attaining the rank which they otherwise would have attained in consideration of some paltry remuneration that they would never have accepted if the matter had been fairly left to them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped that, as they had been discussing this question for several hours, they would now come to a vote upon it.

MR. LINDSAY said, he would withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress if a pledge were given that justice would be done to the masters.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the "F.G." list had not been dealt with at all, and formed a question that must be raised again. The grievance of the lieutenants in respect to leave, demanded attention. Those officers asked for a month's leave in every year, which was a small boon. They were now practically isolated from their friends, even when on the home station.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Lindsay.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,775, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the additional Charge for altering and improving the system of Retirement of Officers of the Royal Navy, and reducing the number of Officers on the Active List of the Navy, which will come in course of payment during the nine months ending on the 31st day of March, 1865."

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, that if the Admiralty would examine that matter, and take into consideration the other officers who were nearly in the same position as those concerned in this Vote, it would see that it could not stop there, but must go a good deal further.

Colonel Edwards

LORD CLARENCE PAGET begged to point out the clear distinction which existed between the case of those captains whose retirement on the reserved list was voluntary, and those whose retirement was compulsory.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Charles Berkeley.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

HIGHWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir George Grey.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill. It comprised a great many details which would require to be considered in a Select Committee, and the discussion could then be taken on the Report. He thought, therefore, that discussion on its details should be waived for the present.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to know what would be the scope of the inquiry before the Committee. The Bill was very important, as it proposed to confer great additional powers on justices of the peace, and to diminish the powers of the rate-payers. The Act had not worked well in that part of the country with which he was connected, and he was anxious to know whether the Select Committee would be empowered to take any evidence.

MR. THOMPSON said, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would not press the second reading of the Bill at that late hour, as it would involve very important questions.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was no general principle to be discussed at that stage, and he trusted, therefore, that the second reading would be agreed to. If the Act had not been successful in the quarter referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell), it was because too large districts had been created.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY said, the Bill would require very mature consideration. He thought that it would be satisfactory for the Bill to undergo discussion in a Committee upstairs.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>.

SIR GEORGE GREY begged to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. It would be desirable not to instruct the Committee to take evidence, because the Committee could, if they thought it necessary, apply to the House for permission to hear witnesses with respect to any particular provision.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

BEERHOUSES (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 109.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Excise Officers not to grant a Licence or Renewal Licence without Certificate of Justices.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he thought the object of the Bill, which was to impose some restrictions on the low class of beer-houses in Ireland, a proper one; but he conceived that the present clause went too far, for it would compel not only ordinary beer-house keepers, but brewers and the vendors of table beer, who could now sell beer not to be drunk on the premises, under an Excise licence, to apply to the magistrates for a licence.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it was impossible to make any distinction between respectable and disreputable brewers. He understood that there was no such class in Dublin as vendors of table beer at three-halfpence a quart. If that clause were not adopted, it was the opinion of the police that the Bill would be perfectly valueless.

MR. HENNESSY begged to ask the right hon. Baronet whether the Bill did not include brewers?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said it did. It was meant to apply to all persons selling beer not to be drunk on the premises. He could not suppose that a respectable brewer would have any objection to send his clerk to the magistrates to obtain such a licence.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, there was no licence of the kind in England, and he hoped Irish Members would resist its introduction into Ireland.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN begged to suggest that the beer-houses should be placed under strict police regulations and surveillance, so that if those regulations were violated the licence could be taken away. That would be found sufficient for every purpose. He objected to placing in the hands of a few justices the power of preventing persons carrying on what might be considered legitimate trade.

MR. HENNESSY said, the clause would apply to brewers, which, in his opinion, would be very vexatious to such men as Messrs. Guinness and other respectable brewers. He begged to move a proviso to the effect that nothing contained in the clause should apply to any person holding a brewer's licence. He felt convinced that there could be no intention of applying the vexatious penalties and prohibitions provided by the clause to the trade of brewing.

MR. HASSARD said, the evil against which the Bill was directed arose only in the case of beer-house keepers, and could not apply to brewers.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he must object to proceeding at that late hour of the night with the Bill, and, therefore, he would beg to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he objected to the measure on the ground that it would establish a different law between the two countries.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he understood that the object of the Bill was to place under police surveillance those houses which, under the plea of selling beer, retailed spirits, and that was a purpose which Irish Members would be most ready to support. That clause, however, went further than that, and he was of opinion that it would improve the Bill to strike out the clause altogether.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the subject had been well considered by the Government and he must adhere to the clause as it stood. No doubt the clause would apply to such establishments as the Messrs. Guinness's, but it was impossible to draw a distinction between one class of traders and another.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, that the hon. Baronet had, in his opinion, wholly failed to show a sufficient reason for the enactment of that clause.

COLONEL WILLIAM STUART said, he could not see any reason why a law should be enacted for Ireland differing from that which existed in England. The beer-houses in Ireland could be placed under the supervision of the police without such a clause as that proposed.

MR. NEWDEGATE considered that some restriction ought to be placed on the granting of beer licences, but was unable to say how far the clause would apply to brewers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY begged to suggest that the words of the English Act should be adopted. The Bill ought clearly to be confined to common brewers who sold beer by retail.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he very much questioned whether the Act applied to brewers at all. It only extended, he thought, to licensed beer-houses.

MR. O'HAGAN said, he had never considered that the penalties under the clause could apply to the great brewers.

LORD NAAS said, that if a brewer's licence allowed the selling of beer by retail it would apply to him; but that was a point on which the Committee were not informed.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought it right to tell the Committee that the Bill did apply to such brewers as Messrs. Guinness. If the Committee were of opinion that it ought not to apply to the great brewers that would be another question.

MR. LYGON said, there appeared to be a startling discrepancy of opinion between the right hon. Baronet and the Attorney General for Ireland, and that was a good reason for reporting Progress, in order that those two right hon. Gentlemen might come to some accord as to the real effect of the clause.

MR. MAGUIRE begged to suggest the postponement of the clause, but as the Bill was very much wanted in Ireland he hoped it would be proceeded with. He did not think the great brewers should be treated with any indignity.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he thought the Bill a very inadequate, a very useless, and, in some clauses, a very objectionable one. He should persevere with his Motion to report Progress.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Tuesday next.

LIFE ANNUITIES AND LIFE ASSURANCES.—[DEFICIENCY OF ASSETS, &c.] COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER begged to move a Resolution—

Colonel William Stuart

authorizing any deficiency in the assets of the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt in connection with Deferred Annuities and Life Assurance, to be made a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

Resolved,

That it is expedient to empower the Commissioners of the Treasury to issue out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland such sums as may be requisite to make good any deficiency that may arise in the Assets of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt applicable to the Payment of Deferred Life Annuities, and to Payments to be made on Death, and also to empower the Commissioners of the Treasury to convert certain Capital Stocks of Annuities into an equivalent amount of Annuities for a Term of years.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported this day.

LIMITED PENALTIES BILL—[BILL 94.]

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(The Solicitor General.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL begged to explain the objects of the Bill. One of the Militia Acts contained a clause that every deserter should be punished by a fine of 40s., or by imprisonment. A deserter was brought before the magistrates of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and they took upon themselves to reduce the penalty from 40s. to half-a-crown. They did so in consequence of a clause introduced into a Gas Act for Newcastle-on-Tyne. It was thought very improper that a Gas Act or any local Act should confer power on the justices to abrogate altogether the general public legislation of the country. It was proposed by the Bill to prevent the application of any similar clause in any other Gas Act. It was not prospective, it was only retrospective; therefore they should be more cautious in allowing such a proviso to be introduced.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup>, and passed.

WEIGHING OF GRAIN (PORT OF LONDON) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CRAWFORD, Bill to regulate the Weighing of Grain in the Port of London, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. THOMAS BAKING, and Mr. HUBBARD. Bill presented, and read 1st. [Bill 119.]

BANKING CO-PARTNERSHIPS BILL.

Bank Notes to sue and be sued by their public officer; presented, and read 1<sup>o</sup>. [Bill 118.]

One o'clock.

MIDDLE CLASS EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he desired to ask a Question of the noble Earl the President of the Council, upon a subject which was about to be brought under their Lordships' notice upon the Motion of the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope); but his Question referred to Middle Class Schools, whereas the noble Earl's Motion referred only to the great schools for the higher classes. He would remind their Lordships that, five years ago, he brought the subject of middle class schools before this House in presenting 120 petitions, signed by above 15,000 persons, warm friends of education; a still greater number had been presented to the other House, the total signatures being above 40,000 to the petitions in both Houses. The complaint made at that time was—and it was repeated in 1860—that there being ample care taken to have well qualified teachers in the schools for the upper classes, and in those for the working classes, there were no means provided for securing proper teachers for the middle class schools. The middle class, if not so numerous as the others, were nevertheless a most important body. The working classes amounted to four-fifths of the people, or fifteen millions and a half; the upper classes to above three millions; the middle classes to about half a million. A right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lincoln), who had given him his most valuable support, estimated them at considerably less, but still at a large number; and for the schools used by this most important portion of our fellow subjects no inspection whatever was provided. Care was taken to prevent unqualified persons practising surgery or medicine; none to prevent the most unfit persons from teaching the children of the middle classes. Neither the petitioners, nor himself, nor the bishop, had the least idea of using compulsion; but they believed that if Inspectors were appointed, with the power of granting certificates of qualification to teachers, almost all schools would voluntarily submit themselves to inspection, from knowing the certain effects of such certificates to secure the attendance of scholars. The difficulty arising from want of funds and from the unwillingness to impose new duties on the present Inspectors, had prevented his noble Friend the Lord President from at once complying with the demand; but he had promised that he would take the complaints of the petitioners into consideration, and that the matter should receive immediate attention. He (Lord Brougham) now desired to ask his noble Friend, Whether the subject had been considered by the Committee of Council, and with what result?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the subject alluded to by the noble and learned Lord had been very frequently under the consideration of the Government, but it had been found very difficult to deal with it in a satisfactory manner, or to act upon the suggestions which had been made. Great doubts had been entertained how far Parliament would sanction the expenditure of public money in aid of middle class schools, which were matters of private enterprise. He thought that of late years the education of the middle class had been much extended and improved by means of voluntary agencies, and that associations were being formed for the purpose of training masters for middle class schools.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he was very far from proposing any grant of public money for the foundation or support of schools. He felt most thankful for the large sums already granted. He (Lord Brougham) had first obtained from his Colleagues in 1832 the sum of £20,000, to be vested in the Committee of Privy Council, according to the recommendation in the Report of the celebrated Education Committee of the Commons in 1817 and 1818; that sum had now increased to £700,000 or £800,000—and with the effect of largely increasing the number of schools and improving the quality of their education. But for the middle classes no such improvement had been made, and their schools might be in the worst hands, both as to the master's capacity for teaching and as to his character. The same remark applied to schoolmistresses. What he desired was that there should be a Government officer to inspect middle class schools; but that submission to inspection should be entirely voluntary on the part of the governors and other managers of those schools.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS COMMISSION.

ADDRESS FOR A PAPER.

EARL STANHOPE rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Public Schools Commission, and especially to the course of instruction which is therein discussed; to inquire the intentions of Her Majesty's Government; and to move for Copies of any Minute of the Board of Treasury, or Resolution of the Committee of the Privy Council, relative to the recent Report of the Public Schools Commission. The noble Earl said it appeared to him that their Lordships' House was especially fitted for the consideration of the subject, as it included among its members many right rev. Prelates who had taken part, more or less directly, in the work of public instruction, and two of whom—the Primate and the Bishop of London—had themselves been at the head of great public schools. That was a great advantage, and he hoped that either upon the present occasion, or in other debates which might be expected to take place at a later period, the House would be favoured with the results of their past experience and of their present judgment. He desired, in the first place, to acknowledge, in the fullest manner, the ability, industry, and candour with which the Report had been drawn up. The Commission was presided over by the noble Earl opposite the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (the Earl of Clarendon), and comprised also two other Members of their Lordships' House (Lords Devon and Lytton). They sat during three years, and exhibited the most unwearied zeal in eliciting information by every possible means—by printed queries, by oral examination, by private letters, and by personal visits to the schools. They had brought together a vast mass of evidence, which they had digested with great fairness, and which could not fail to be of signal service in promoting improvement in those schools. The Commissioners, therefore, were entitled to the cordial thanks of that House; and in any criticisms which he might make upon particular portions of the Report, he hoped that such criticisms would not be deemed, as in truth he did not feel them to be, inconsistent with the general commendation which he had now expressed. The Commissioners observed with great truth that there should be some principal branch of study to which the largest share of attention should be awarded. He apprehended there would be no difference of opinion on that point. Coming to the classical foundation of those schools, he found that upon that point the Commissioners made some excellent remarks, with a few of which he would trouble the House. The Commissioners said—

"We are convinced that the best materials available to Englishmen for these studies are furnished by the languages and literature of Greece and Rome. From the regular structure of these languages, from their logical accuracy of expression, from the comparative ease with which their etymology is traced and reduced to general laws, from their severe canons of taste and style, from the very fact that they are 'dead,' and have been handed down to us directly from the periods of their highest perfection, comparatively untouched by the inevitable process of degeneration and decay, they are, beyond all doubt, the finest and most serviceable models we have for the study of language."

Then, they added—

"Besides this, it is at least a reasonable opinion that this literature has had a powerful effect in moulding and animating the statesmanship and political life of England."

To the same effect was the letter of Mr. Gladstone, as printed in the second volume. In those opinions he (Earl Stanhope) entirely concurred; as he was persuaded that a classical foundation was essential to the proper course of study at public schools, and that any departure from that foundation must be attended by a loss of character and utility in those great establishments. He trusted that the time would never come when, in either that House or the other House, there should be any desire to depart from that foundation of classical study. Then, as to mathematics. The importance of the study of mathematics was, no doubt, very great. Looke had declared that he would have studied mathematics, even if the hard condition had been imposed that he should afterwards forget all and every part of it, because the habit of close reasoning and the exactness of thought which the study of mathematics imparted to the mind would still remain. He thought that, concurring in that view, their Lordships would be prepared to assent to the desire which the Commission had expressed, that the study of mathematics should be still maintained. Their words were—

"The importance of arithmetic and mathematics is already recognized in every school, and it is only necessary that they should be taught more effectively. The arithmetical and mathematical course should, we think, include arithmetic, so taught as to make every boy thoroughly familiar with it, and the elements of geometry, algebra, and plane trigonometry. We agree with the Astronomer Royal, Sir C. Lyell, and Dr. Whewell, in thinking it very desirable that in the case of the more advanced students the course should comprise also an introduction to applied mathematics."

He confessed that he should be inclined to hesitate in accepting the last recommendation, thinking that the higher branches of mathematics had better be reserved for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Then, as to history and geography, the Commissioners said that greater attention should be paid to those subjects. They were undoubtedly important subjects of study, and the only question was how sufficient time could be found to allow of compliance with that recommendation. Then, as to modern languages. It was only of late years that these languages had received the attention which they deserved; but at present they were taught at all our public schools, with only one exception. The Commissioners say—

"One modern language, at least, now forms part of the regular course at every school but Eton. We are of opinion that all the boys at every school should, in some part at least of their passage through it, learn either French or German."

He had so much respect for the judgment of the present authorities at Eton, that he could not think how accomplished men would permit that eminent seat of learning to remain much longer lagging behind in the study of that most useful branch of education. The Commissioners said, "They desire also to see more attention paid to English composition." He certainly thought it not at all creditable that any schoolboy should leave school without an adequate knowledge of English spelling. That does not seem an extraordinary requisition, yet some portions of this volume would show that it was one which was not constantly complied with. They said that the elements of English composition ought also to be studied. But were they studied? He would call their Lordships' attention to one passage, which would show how far they were from adopting a right course on that subject. At page 83 the head master of Eton gave his opinion as follows:—

"A boy ought to learn French before he comes to Eton, and we could take measures to keep it up as we keep up English."

Upon this the head master is very naturally asked by Lord Clarendon, as chairman, "What measures do you now take to keep up English at Eton?" And the answer is, "There are none at present, except through the ancient languages!" It seemed, then, that in the opinion of the head master French was to be kept up at Eton just as English is, and that English is not to be kept up at all! He must say he had read these answers with very great concern. He would not comment on them further, but he must express a hope that Eton, which had shown so generous and liberal a spirit on so many other things, would display a spirit not less liberal and generous on this most important and pressing matter. He had gone through several branches of study that were even now cultivated more or less at public schools, and in nearly all of which the Commissioners recommended some additional consumption of time and study. But beyond this the Commissioners proposed to introduce new branches of education. In respect to this there might be some difference of opinion. The Commissioners gave it as their opinion that every youth should learn either music or drawing as a part of his public school education. From that recommendation he must say he dissented. Some pupils had a natural inaptitude for music. That the Commissioners admitted; but they seemed to take it as a matter of course, that if there was an inaptitude for music there would be an aptitude for design. But, if he was not able to sing, it surely did not follow that he must be able to draw; because he had not an artist's ear it did not follow that he must have an artist's hand. The question was not as to the value of these acquirements, but whether they should be taught of necessity at school. He thought this an injudicious recommendation of the Commissioners and one which Her Majesty's Government when they came to announce their intentions ought not to affirm. The Commissioners also recommended the teaching of the elements of natural science in public schools. Now, no one was more alive than he was to the great importance and value of natural science; but it was a very different thing to propose that this study, instead of being reserved for the University, should of necessity be taught at the school. The most eminent schoolmasters were decidedly against its being taught at school; but, in spite of this, the Commissioners were determined to proceed, and they said—

"With sincere respect for the views of the eminent schoolmasters who differ from us in opinion, we are convinced that the introduction of the elements of natural science into the regular course of study is desirable, and we see no sufficient reason to doubt its practicability."

He trusted he would not be misunderstood on this point, as if he doubted the great importance and value of natural science; but he questioned very much whether, with the other calls on the time of boys, natural science could properly and advantageously be adopted as part of a public school course. And this brought him to what he desired to say was a general objection to the recommendations he had just referred to. The Commissioners did not state what branches of study were useless, or might safely be dispensed with; they never spoke of omissions or of substitutes, and the burden of their recommendations might be comprised in one word, "Add! add! add!" Nothing was taken away. In this view of the subject, the health of the boys was not sufficiently considered. The importance of recreation had been admitted, not merely by men who were themselves inclined to leisure, but by some of the hardest students that ever lived. There was a passage of Milton, in his letter to Mr. Hartlib, which described the benefit of summer pastime to the young—a beautiful passage, which, as it was only in one sentence, he might venture to read—

"Besides these constant exercises at home, there is another opportunity of gaining experience to be won from pleasure itself abroad; in those vernal seasons of the year when the air is calm and pleasant it were an injury and sullenness against nature not to go out and see her riches and partake in her rejoicing with heaven and earth."

It was true that the Commissioners did make mention in their Report of the importance of athletic games; but what was this but a hollow form of words if, while recommending games, they at the same time deprived boys of all leisure to pursue them? It was like recommending a lavish course of expenditure to a man whom, at the same moment, they were despoiling of his money. The case was, indeed, much stronger than he had hitherto stated, for the best writers on physiology in the present day concurred in lamenting the evils of over-study in young persons, and its injurious effects not only on the body, but on the mind. He durst say many of their Lordships had read the Essays of Sir Henry Holland and Sir Benjamin Brodie, and there was one quotation which he would take the liberty of making from the latter of those eminent physicians. Sir Benjamin said—

Earl Stanhope

"In young persons it is not the mind only that suffers from too large a demand being made on it for the purposes of study. Relaxation and cheerful occupation are essential to the proper development of the corporeal structure and faculties, and the want of them operates like an unwholesome atmosphere or defective nourishment to produce the lasting evils of indifferent health and a stunted growth."

There was a further evil of over-study. Those who practised it—and there were too many instances of it in the present day—learned to regard education not as the means, but as the end. Education was meant only as the means—the stepping stone—from which men might spring forward to the active duties of life; but the effect of over-exertion in the youthful mind was to make it regard education as the final end, instead of the means. They might compare it to running in a race where the goal was reached, but the runner dropped down breathless and faint, and incapable for a length of time of making any further effort or trial of his strength. He deemed it the more necessary to refer to this matter, because he thought this ill result had been practically experienced to some extent during the few last years in the Indian Civil Service.

The course of his argument had now brought him to this point:—They were agreed—or, at least, he hoped so—that the classical languages should be the foundation of the studies at public schools; but they might inquire whether there was any branch of study not essential to that classical foundation which had been introduced at a very recent period, and which, in the opinion of the most eminent classical scholars, so far from improving, actually deteriorated the character of that foundation? He maintained that there was such a branch of study, and he would explicitly name it—Greek. Greek composition in prose and verse. On that point he might refer to the opinion recently expressed by Mr. Gladstone in a remarkable speech made elsewhere, and with which he had no doubt their Lordships were acquainted. That speech had been deemed a most excellent one by those who were best qualified to judge of such a subject. The only fault he had heard found with it was, that it was a little too Conservative—a fault which certainly could not be imputed to all the recent speeches of the same right hon. Gentleman. Mr. Gladstone spoke of the practice of composition in Greek verse and prose and in Latin verse as having, in his judgment, been "carried to great excess." Now, the composition of Latin verse stood on an entirely different footing from the composition of Greek verse; because the former was coeval with the very foundation of these schools, and formed a necessary part of their studies. It appeared from a passage in the well-known Panton Letters, which the Commissioners had adduced—and which had been previously cited by Mr. Hallam for the same purpose—that so early as 1468, or rather, perhaps, 1478, which was, he believed, the right date, Latin verses—no doubt barbarous enough—used to be composed at Eton. Thus for a period of 400 years Latin verses had formed part of the instruction at that school. The composition of Greek verse, on the other hand, appeared to be quite of recent origin. The exact date of its introduction did not seem to have been ascertained; but it was only within a very few years indeed that it had attained its present growth. Thus, in one part of the evidence in the third volume of the Report relative to Eton, Mr. Twisleton asked a most eminent Etonian, Sir John Coleridge—

“Do they not now write Greek iambics, which formerly were omitted nearly altogether?”

Sir John Coleridge answered—

“Yes; Mr. Lonsdale, who had been examining at Eton for the Newcastle Scholarship, told me it was quite extraordinary both the facility and the accuracy with which the boys composed in Greek. He mentioned one or two boys who in a short time had poured out their sixty, seventy, or eighty Greek iambics with hardly a flaw in them.”

So in like manner any of their Lordships who had attended at Harrow on Speech-day could not but have observed the great pains bestowed by the boys on their Greek verses, or fail to have been struck by the proficiency with which passages from Shakespeare were translated into Greek iambics. Some persons might think that that proficiency ought to be commended and encouraged; but his own opinion was quite otherwise. It was certainly desirable that what was done at all should be done well, but he entreated their Lordships to consider the immense cost of time and application before these laborious results could be obtained. Let them look at the amount of study and exertion before a boy could attain to the facility of pouring out sixty or seventy Greek iambics in a limited time. Why, years must be required for such an accomplishment. If Shakespeare were now alive, with what exquisite ridicule would he not denounce the preposterous practice of making boys turn his comedies into Greek verse! He was happy to think that the practice of Greek verse composition had few adherents left—one of the very few was his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton), whom he saw before him at the table. A great distinction was to be observed also between Latin and Greek composition in prose. The former was not only a very elegant accomplishment, but it was of decided utility; for Latin was, to some extent, the medium of communication between the learned men in every part of the world. Works in medicine or in philosophy, for instance, were frequently composed in Latin, so as to be available to the scholars of various nations. Then again, in writing epitaphs, odes, addresses, and on certain other occasions, a knowledge of Latin composition was valuable. He was sure that none of their Lordships who were at Oxford last summer on a memorable occasion could wish Latin composition to be dispensed with, for he believed that none who heard it had forgotten the classical and beautiful Latin in which the noble Earl the Chancellor of that University commemorated the august presence and the winning grace of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. He might observe also that the composition of Latin verse had served to dignify the leisure and employ the minds of men who had been among the most distinguished ornaments of their Lordships' House; for example, Lord Grenville and the Marquess Wellesley. But not so with Greek. Who would ever think of delivering a Greek address in a University; or who would write a Greek letter to a foreign correspondent? Why, the man who did so would cover himself with ridicule. There was this distinction, therefore, between Greek and Latin composition, that Latin composition was useful in prose, and elegant, and to some extent useful also in verse, but that the very reverse was the case in regard to Greek composition. He thought it must be owned, then, that, waiving the point of scholarship, there was no part of the education more thoroughly worthless than the practice of Greek composition. The point of scholarship was the only possible point in which it could be defended. If it did not improve their scholarship it did nothing, or worse than nothing. But did Greek composition improve their scholarship? There was a strong primâ facie argument to prove that it did not. This was, he believed, the only country in Europe where Greek composition in verse or prose was practised at all. Well, if it were useful, or, still more, if it were essential to scholarship, then our Greek scholars should be very superior to the Greek scholars of every other country. But he thought it must be owned that the German scholars were even superior in Greek to ours. He said that with all possible respect to the very eminent scholars among ourselves. With the aid of Greek composition, then, they did not, at all events, attain a higher standard of Greek scholarship than that which existed where it was not practised. But the question did not end there. They were able to produce very strong testimony to the fact, that even in the single point of scholarship Greek composition, far from being useful, was positively useless and injurious. Upon this point Dr. Whewell, who for more than twenty years had been Master of Trinity College, and who was held in high respect by every one, made the following striking remarks :—

“As writing Latin verse ought not much to occupy the student's time till a skill in writing Latin prose is secured, still less ought the writing of Greek prose to hold a leading place in the classical student's employments. This exercise may, perhaps, come with advantage at an advanced period of the progress of a scholar of eminent aptitude, but it cannot be considered as at all essential to the character even of a good Greek scholar. Many, perhaps most, of the more distinguished Greek scholars who have existed would probably have failed in an attempt to write Greek well. It is possible that practice directed to this special point may enable young students at the present day to perform such tasks with surprising correctness and ingenuity; but such practice can hardly form a large part of the general course of classical teaching without leading to losses which far overbalance this gain. . . . The performances of some modern scholars have shown that an extraordinary degree of success is attainable in such exercises; but it does not appear judicious to make such performances an essential part of Greek scholarship, or even a necessary test of an accomplished Greek scholar. If they are so treated they are likely to draw to them a disproportioned amount of the student's time and attention; and, however completely such an accomplishment may be acquired, it does not imply any profound or extensive acquaintance with Greek authors in general. We may even add that this accomplishment may be pursued in such a manner as to direct the student's labours from good Greek authors; when, for instance, the faculty is cultivated by studying rules and collections of phrases made for this purpose, or by imitating previous imitations which we conceive to be remarkably successful. Such modes of classical study are very unworthy of being parts of a liberal education.”

Dr. Whewell summed up his opinion as follows :—

“The great amount of time and attention which is bestowed upon these accomplishments in this University has, I think, an unfavourable effect upon the knowledge of classical literature which our scholars require.”

Such was the accomplishment to which

not only months but years were sacrificed, and, after all, the result in the opinion of a most eminent man was actually unfavourable to the knowledge of classical literature. Was there ever a stronger case made out against a branch of study, or was there ever a greater necessity shown for some change? An argument was often put forward on the other side which had really no weight at all. It was frequently asserted that men who had become eminent in after life had distinguished themselves at college in Latin and Greek composition. There was, for instance, a noble Earl now present (the Earl of Ellenborough) who was once Governor General of India, and whose eloquence had so often delighted their Lordships. The first thing we heard of him was that he went from Eton to Cambridge and there gained a prize for Latin verse. Of an eminent man in the House of Commons—Sir Roundell Palmer, the Attorney General, a Gentleman most deserving of esteem and respected by all the world—we heard, in like manner, that he wrote a prize poem at Oxford. Surely, however, this proved nothing at all. If the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were to patronize some more recondite language—Sanskrit, for example, or Aramaic—the students, in their usual spirit of emulation, would exert themselves to the utmost to learn these tongues and to write prize poems in them; and the cleverest young men would, just as now, be those who would prevail. It appeared to him that there was an entire misconception upon this point, for it was ability that produced the prize verses, and not the prize verses that produced the ability. He was sorry to say that recently, in a spirit of over-kindness, additional facilities had been afforded to the practice of Greek composition. The University of Oxford, out of respect to the late Dr. Gaisford, had permitted the foundation by some private persons of a new prize for Greek composition in prose and verse. Far be it from him to begrudge that or any other honour to the memory of Dr. Gaisford; but he confessed he saw with regret that the liberality of the University was applied to an object which he thought ought to be discouraged rather than promoted. Latin composition in prose stood upon a different footing, and he should also wish Latin verse to be still studied, though he was persuaded that the latter had heretofore been permitted to occupy too much of the time and attention of students. In the practical recommendation of the Com-misioners bearing upon this very point he could not concur. It was that—

“Arrangements should be made for allowing boys, after arriving at a certain place in the school, and upon the request of their parents or guardians, to drop some portion of their classical work (for example, Latin verse and Greek composition), in order to devote more time to modern languages, mathematics, or natural science.”

He entirely objected to this reference to parents or guardians, which would tend to assimilate the practice of public to that of private schools. It was not consistent with the independence of public schools. Many of their Lordships knew that the main difficulty with which the heads of private schools had to contend was injudicious interference on the part of parents. An anxious mother wrote to the head master of a private school, “I hope you will not think it necessary to teach my dear boy arithmetic, because it always gives him a headache;” or, “I trust you will not push him any further in Greek, for he declares the Greek alphabet is very hard.” It was extremely difficult for the head master of a private school to maintain an independent course in the teeth of such requests, however much he might be inclined to do so. Surely their Lordships would not wish to see such a system introduced into the public schools? It was the duty of the heads of those great establishments to prescribe themselves the course of study, and then to permit parents to send their boys or not, as they thought fit. Besides, he asked their Lordships to reflect how inadequate parents often were to form an intelligent opinion upon such points. Their Lordships might know instances in which mothers, left widows in straitened circumstances, had voluntarily deprived themselves of all the luxuries, and many even of the comforts, of life to obtain for their sons the advantages of a public school education; such cases were not unfrequent, and they were exceedingly meritorious and honourable to all parties concerned. Let their Lordships suppose a lady in such circumstances receiving the following letter from a head master:—“Dear Madam, I wish to learn your opinion of Greek iambs, and whether you judge it best that your son at this school should go on with Latin alcaics.” What answer could the poor gentlewoman return to such inquiries, and what would be its value when received? But his objection to that recommendation of the Commissioners did not stop here. Could anything be more injudicious than when there was a doubt about a practice, they should advise that a study might be commenced with a view to its being discontinued at a certain point? If boys were to drop their work of composition just when they were attaining some proficiency in it, surely it would be better not to commence it at all? And yet this was what the Commissioners recommended. On the whole, his opinion was that Greek composition ought to be discouraged and altogether discontinued, for the advantages of the accomplishment were very far more than counterbalanced by the loss of time which it entailed, and by the consequent neglect of more useful studies, such as modern languages, English composition, and mathematics. To that part of the Report of the Commissioners which related to the system of Government there was only one point on which he would make a remark. It was proposed that there should be a council of assistant-masters, with co-ordinate powers, to aid the head master in the government of the school. That appeared to him to be a very dangerous innovation, inasmuch as it would weaken the authority of the head master. Such a council, like other legislative bodies, would soon become subject to divisions; and when the boys once learnt, as they would be sure to do, that there were so many masters on one side and so many on the other, their confidence in and respect for the central authority would be diminished. A bishop who had been for many years at the head of a great public school told him that during the whole of the time he had never had a single difference with any of his masters, but that, nevertheless, if an order had been issued directing such a council as was indicated by the Commissioners to take effect on Monday, he would have sent in his resignation on Tuesday. He would not have held the office for a single day on those terms. There was a vast difference between a head master freely consulting with his assistants and being controlled by a council with co-ordinate powers, whose decisions he would practically be compelled to obey. The head master was now, as it were, a limited monarch; let them take care that they did not make him a Doge of Venice with his Council of Ten. He wished to ascertain from the Government what course they intended to pursue in regard to the recommendations of the Commission, and he trusted that if they had formed any decision in the matter they would announce it. While desiring to see the improvements required in the public schools carried out without unnecessary delay, he yielded to no man in his respect for and attachment to those noble institutions. He looked upon them, even with all their imperfections, as one of the glories of England. He rejoiced to see how manly, how high-minded was the tone of feeling which for the most part they inspired—how sacred in the eyes of every schoolboy was his word of honour when once it had been passed, and how rarely, if ever, he swerved one iota from it. "I hope, Sir, you believe me," said a boy to Dr. Arnold. "I do believe you," replied Dr. Arnold; "your story is highly improbable, but nothing in the whole world is so improbable as that one of my boys should tell me an untruth." There lay the virtue of the English public school system. He hoped that system would long endure, that they would never cease to honour and uphold it, and that they would never, at any period or under any pressure, consent to surrender the solid classical foundation on which it stood, or those principles of Christian piety by which it was sustained. The noble Earl concluded by moving an Address for—

"Copies of any Minute of the Board of Treasury or Resolution of the Committee of the Privy Council relative to the Second Report of the Public Schools Commission."

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, it must be a source of great satisfaction to his colleagues on the Public Schools Commission, as it certainly was to himself, that the attention of their Lordships had been drawn to the Report by one so eminently qualified for the task as his noble Friend, whose varied acquirements, sound judgment, and high, well-earned literary reputation, gave so much weight to his opinions. He begged, in the name of the Commission, to thank his noble Friend for the manner in which he had spoken of their labours. Their labours were not light; but the Commissioners applied themselves to their duties, which were in some respects of an inquisitorial and even invidious character, with a deep sense of their responsibility to the country, but also in a spirit of fairness and good feeling towards the schools. Besides visiting these establishments, the Commissioners had upwards of 120 meetings; and as the inquiry proceeded the interest never flagged. Throughout, they had taken pains to observe how the character of the boys was formed—how the raw material, as it were, of English intellect was prepared for the various duties of after life, and in what manner, and to what extent, the qualities essential to good citizens and Christian gentlemen were fostered in the schools. The Report of the Commission might be somewhat ponderous and uninviting; but they ought not to grudge the length of an inquiry which had enabled them to elicit the views and evidence of men eminent in science and literature, as well as of those more immediately connected with public education. The information thus recorded would be long appealed to to show the errors to be avoided and the objects to be attained in our public school system. As each school was treated separately, anyone who wished to learn the state of a particular institution need not read the whole Report. The general Report summed up the evidence and recommendations of the Committee, and it was impossible for anyone, however little concerned in the question of education, not to peruse with the same pleasure and advantage as the Commissioners had listened to it, the evidence of the Astronomer Royal, Professor Owen, Sir Charles Lyell, Professor Max Müller, and other distinguished men. He was glad to find that his noble Friend concurred with the Commissioners as to the importance of retaining the classics as the basis of public school education. He was satisfied the great majority of their Lordships would share the same view; but, as some objection had been raised on the subject, he would read the opinions of Dr. Temple, the head master of Rugby, who put the case very ably—

"All studies up to a certain point help each other, but among all the possible studies this power appears pre-eminently to belong to those which I class under the general name of literature. Modern literature is not fully intelligible, except to those who have studied the classics. A student of mathematics does not find it any help to him to study the early writers on the science. No one is aided in learning the differential calculus by going back to fluxions; nor will the study of physical science gain much by beginning with the writings of earlier discoverers. But literature can only be studied thoroughly by going to its source. Modern theology, modern philosophy, modern law, modern history, modern poetry, are never quite understood unless we begin with their ancient counterparts. In the next place, the perfect and peculiar beauty of the classical literature will always put it at the head of all other."

Then Dr. Temple quotes the following opinion of Mr. James Stuart Mill:—

"The classic life contains precisely the true correction for the chief defects of modern life. The classic writers exhibit precisely that order of virtues in which we are apt to be deficient. They altogether show human nature on a grander scale, with less benevolence, but more patriotism; less sentiment, but more self-control; if a lower average of virtue, more striking individual examples of it; fewer small goodnesses, but more greatness and appreciation of greatness; more which tends to exalt the imagination and inspire high conceptions of the capabilities of human nature. If, as everyone must see, the want of affinity of these studies to the modern mind is gradually lowering them in popular estimation, this is but a confirmation of the need of them, and renders it more incumbent upon those who have the power to do their utmost to aid in preventing their decline."

The Commissioners, therefore, did not complain that the lion's share of time was devoted to that study. But what they did complain of was, that if a boy showed no proficiency in classics he had no chance of turning to other studies, and seeing whether his powers might not be developed in some other branches of learning. But their Lordships would find in the Evidence appended to the Report answers from the most distinguished persons in the Universities, almost all of whom concurred in declaring that the preparation for the University course was imperfectly performed in the great public schools—they said that the young men came up to the Universities with very slovenly habits of mind, that they were deficient in the elementary parts of grammar and mathematics—they stated that the knowledge possessed by these youths of English literature was very imperfect, and that their acquaintance with arithmetic was most meagre, and indeed that one third of them were unable to pass the matriculation examination, which was a very simple one. He would now take the liberty of reading the opinion of the Rev. Mr. Butler, the head master of Harrow School, as to the general results, under favourable circumstances, attending the passage of a boy through a public school. Mr. Butler said—

"I believe that the system of education pursued at Harrow is admirably adapted to train a boy to do his duty efficiently, and in a generous spirit, in any position of life to which he may be called. It does not profess to train him directly for any one particular profession or employment, nor is it pretended that when a boy leaves Harrow at the age of eighteen or nineteen, he has reached more than the threshold of the education of his life. His actual acquirements are, probably, extremely scanty; with many of the most useful mental accomplishments he is very imperfectly equipped; to many of the highest branches of knowledge he is practically an entire stranger—he is still a boy, and not a man; but it is confidently believed that if he has employed his time diligently at school, he will carry with him, when he leaves it, some capacity for thinking clearly, some sense of the value of accuracy and thoroughness in work, some respect for knowledge for its own sake, some appreciation of the most graceful and the most generous, if not yet of the most profound thoughts enshrined in literature a consciousness that he knows but little, and a desire to learn more; and, turning to the moral and social rather than the intellectual side of the education that he has received, a grateful conviction that he has throughout his school course been treated in a kindly and liberal spirit, always largely trusted, and latterly invested with large responsibilities, as one equally interested with the masters in maintaining the moral welfare of the body to which they all alike belong, and taught to believe that that welfare cannot be maintained unless its leaders are distinguished by vigilance, courage, love of justice, sympathy, and courtesy."

That was said of a youth, who, under the best circumstances, and with the highest distinction, had passed through the public school, and who was supposed to have employed his time diligently at school. But it was very well known that a great majority of boys did not employ their time in the same diligent way. Nobody could value or appreciate more fully than he (the Earl of Clarendon) did the training of the public schools as being calculated to make youths manly. It rendered them, through the force of a public opinion prevailing among them, independent, and fostered all the best qualities of their nature. He did not grudge the time given to those games to which the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) had alluded, and which were generally of a national character, tending to make the English gentleman what he was, and what he would, it was to be hoped, long remain. But participation in these sports was not inconsistent with the acquisition of useful knowledge, and there was a great deal of time now passed at public schools, which might be more usefully employed. This state of things ought not to be allowed to continue. The Rev. James Riddell, Fellow and Tutor of Balliol, stated—

"Five-sixths of the pupil-teachers in schools receiving aid from Government are better readers than five-sixths of the men who come to the University. Nearly half of the men who came under my notice as an examiner were imperfect spellers. Many of them are persons who were allowed as boys to carry their idleness with them from form to form, to work below their powers, and merely to move with the crowd—they are men of whom something might have been made, but now it is too late; they are grossly ignorant, and have contracted slovenly habits of mind."

It was melancholy that at public schools there should be no means taken of keeping up the teaching of the English and French languages; though a knowledge of the French language was admitted to be requisite for an English gentleman, yet the authorities of Eton obstinately refused to make it any part of the education of the school. Some fifty or sixty years ago, when the Continent was closed against the English, the inconvenience of not knowing the French language was not then felt; but now, when international communications were complete and cheap, and when everybody travelled, the man who could only speak his own language lost half the advantages of foreign travel. Such a person was dependent on others for information, and became a burden to them, and had, moreover, no access to the poetical, historical, and scientific works, and to the vast mine of thought and intellect in foreign languages, except through the cold and unsatisfactory medium of a translation. Yet at Eton the only French instruction given was by one tutor, whose position was described by himself as an extra, belonging to nobody, and his pupils did not exceed seventy out of a school of 800 boys. He would not, after this, allude to any particular school. It was not his desire to disparage any or institute a comparison into the relative merits of schools. But he wished to say, with respect to the Masters of the different schools, that many of them were men as industrious, as able, and as zealous in the performance of their duties as were to be found in any rank or profession of life, and that many of them knew and agreed with the Commissioners in thinking that the schools were not keeping up with the requirements of the age, and that the Commission would be of great service if it should succeed in directing sufficient public attention to the subject. His noble Friend had referred to the number of hours that the Commissioners proposed should be given to school work, and seemed to think that they had not devoted sufficient consideration to that point, or they would have come to a different conclusion. He seemed to think that the only object of the Commissioners was to keep steadily in view how they were to "add," "add," and he quoted the opinions of two most eminent medical men as to the injurious effects of over-study. But he was sure their Lordships would hear with surprise and satisfaction, that, although they did not propose a different distribution of time between the various studies, they had not recommended the addition of one single hour of school work to what was now the average amount. What they proposed was that twenty hours should be devoted in the course of the week to the various lessons, assuming that they took an hour each, and that ten additional hours would be required for preparation in classics, two in modern languages and natural science, and five in composition. Thus thirty-seven hours of school work was all that they recommended in the course of the week. His noble Friend had referred to natural science, and to the recommendation of the Commissioners on that head, as being opposed to the opinions of the most eminent schoolmasters. But with all due respect for those opinions, the Commissioners felt that the introduction of the study of natural science in schools was most desirable. He should like to read what the Commissioners had said on that point. It was this—

"Natural science, with such slight exceptions as have been noticed above, is practically excluded from the education of the higher classes in England. Education with us is, in this respect, narrower than it was three centuries ago, while science has prodigiously extended her empire, has explored immense tracts, divided them into provinces, introduced into them order and method, and made them accessible to all. This exclusion is, in our view, a plain defect and a great practical evil. It narrows unduly and injuriously the mental training of the young, and the knowledge, interests, and pursuits of men in maturer life. Of the large number of men who have little aptitude or taste for literature, there are many who have an aptitude for science, especially for science which deals, not with abstractions, but with external and sensible objects; how many such there are can never be known as long as the only education given at schools is purely literary; but that such cases are not rare or exceptional can hardly be doubted by any one who has observed either boys or men. Nor would it be an answer were it true, to say that such persons are sure to find their vocation, sooner or later. But this is not true. We believe that many pass through life without useful mental employment, and without the wholesome interest of a favourite study, for want of an early introduction to one for which they are really fit. It is not, however, for such cases only that an early introduction to natural science is desirable. It is desirable, surely, though not necessary, for all educated men. Sir Charles Lyell has remarked on the advantages which the men of literature in Germany enjoy over our own in the general acquaintance which the former possess with what is passing in the scientific world; an advantage due to the fact that natural science, to a greater or less extent, is taught in all the German schools. To clergymen and others who pass most of their lives in the country, or who, in country or town, are brought much into contact with the middle and lower classes, an elementary knowledge of the subject, early gained, has its particular uses; and we believe that its value, as a means of opening the mind and disciplining the faculties, is recognized by all those who have taken the trouble to acquire it, whether men of business or of leisure. It quickens and cultivates directly the faculty of observation, which in very many persons lies almost dormant through life, the power of accurate and rapid generalization, and the mental habit of method and arrangement; it accustoms young persons to trace the sequence of cause and effect; it familiarizes them with a kind of reasoning which interests them, and which they can promptly comprehend; and it is perhaps the best corrective for that indolence which is the vice of half awakened minds, and which shrinks from any exertion that is not, like an effort of memory, merely mechanical. With sincere respect for the opinions of the eminent schoolmasters who differ from us in this matter, we are convinced that the introduction of the elements of natural science into the regular course of study is desirable, and we see no sufficient reason to doubt that it is practicable."

The Commissioners preferred the opinion of such men as the Astronomer Royal, Professor Owen, and Dr. Whewell, to that of the schoolmasters on this subject. His noble Friend (Earl Stanhope), with some reference to his own tastes, condemned them for recommending that music and drawing should form part of the subjects taught in schools. On this point the Report said—

"We are of opinion that every boy should learn either music or drawing, during a part at least of his stay at school. Positive inaptitude for the education of the ear and voice, or for that of the hand and eye, is, we believe, rare; and these accomplishments are useful as instruments of training and valuable possessions in after life."

These subjects were now introduced in the younger schools, and very frequently grown up people were grateful for having learnt them. There was another reflection which his noble Friend had made, and in which he was hardly justified, with reference to the interference of parents. But their Lordships should observe that what the Commissioners proposed was this—that parents might be allowed to suggest some change, because, after all, a parent was likely to be better acquainted with the disposition of his son than the head master. What they recommended, therefore, was that arrangements should be made for allowing boys, at the request of the parents, after arriving at a certain place in the school to drop some portion of the school business—such as Latin verse or Greek composition—in order to devote more time to mathematics, modern languages, natural science, and so on; or, on the other hand, wholly to discontinue mathematics, modern languages, or natural science, in order to give the spare time to other studies. But then the Commissioners added that care should be taken to prevent abuse of that privilege. They recommended that permission to discontinue any portion of the school work should in each case rest with the head master, who, before determining, should consult the boy's tutor, if he had one, and also the master who had given him instruction in the study which it was proposed to discontinue; and should thus satisfy himself as to the propriety of refusing or of giving permission to discontinue that particular study. The Government had found that there existed at Rugby and Harrow the form of school council which the Commissioners suggested, and that it had been attended with the happiest effects. No Minute of the Privy Council had been issued, because the Government thought there was no time this year to go into a full discussion on the subject with respect to the governing bodies of schools and the other points of the system. It was, however, the intention of the Government to bring in on Monday a short Bill, providing that any persons taking office from this time in the governing bodies of the schools should be subject to the provisions of a Bill which it was intended to introduce hereafter. They had no desire to revolutionize the schools; but the fact could not be concealed that these institutions did not entirely keep pace with the requirements of the age, and the demands of public opinion. Her Majesty's Government thought, therefore, that the time had now arrived when it would be neither safe nor proper to postpone legislation upon the subject.

PORTPATRICK HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, When it is probable that the works at Portpatrick Harbour, now being carried out under direction of the Government, will be completed; and, in the event of much further delay occurring in the completion of the works, whether the Government will take into consideration the propriety of having the Mails conveyed to and from the North of Ireland via Stranraer and Larne?

MR. MILNER GIBSON, in reply, said, the works at Portpatrick Harbour were in progress, but from what he had heard it was not probable that they would be completed during the present year. The entrance to the floating dock would be ready in about six weeks, and a large portion of the channel would be deepened in the course of three or four months. With regard to the second question of the hon. Member, he had to state that the proposal for a temporary mail service between Stranraer and Larne, during the construction of the works at Portpatrick, had been considered, but it had not been thought advisable by the authorities to adopt that arrangement.

BRADFORD RESERVOIRS.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is aware by whom Mr. Rawlinson's Report on the Bradford Reservoirs was last week given to the Bradford Corporation and the local press, when it has not yet been printed and delivered to Members of the House of Commons?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he was not aware by what authority the Report had been given to the Bradford Corporation or the local press. The reason why it had not yet been presented to Parliament was that it was to be accompanied with plans, which it would take some time to complete.

PATRIOTIC FUND COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the right hon. Member for Tyrone, When the last Report of the Patriotic Fund Commission will be laid upon the table of the House?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that the Reports of the Patriotic Fund Commission were presented to Parliament by command of Her Majesty, and therefore it did not come within his province to lay them upon the table of the House. The last Report was forwarded to the Secretary of State for War. It had, he believed, been laid before Her Majesty on the 26th of October last, and he was not aware why it was not produced at the commencement of the Session.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—TREATY OF LONDON.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a despatch, dated the 15th of May, from M. von Bismark to Count Bernstorff, has been communicated to Her Majesty's Government? That despatch contains this passage—

"The Government of the King considers itself, in accordance with the declaration of the 31st of January, entirely free from all the obligations of the Treaty of London of 1852, and justified in discussing any other combination independent of that treaty."

This despatch concludes with the words "This and nothing else, can be the task of the Conference."

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that the despatch had not been communicated officially to Her Majesty's Government, and the only knowledge they had of it was from our Ambassador at Berlin, who had sent them a copy taken from a newspaper.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE PRUSSIAN IN JUTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is not aware that the Prussians do not pay for the supplies they exact in Jutland in money, but only by acknowledgments of the amounts in question, which amounts they intend to reckon up against the Danish Government on a future occasion, under the pretence of claims for the expenses of the war, or other demands ; and whether the British Government will allow such a departure from one of the leading conditions of the armistice to which they were parties ?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : From recent accounts, Sir, which we have received, it appears that at present the German troops in Schleswig and Jutland are supplied by contributions or supplies afforded to them, not by the people of the country but by contracts made at Hamburg for the Austrian and Prussian troops. An endeavour was made to get a contract from the people of the country, but the price asked was more than that at which the contract could be made at Hamburg. Orders have also been issued by the Prussian Government that all contributions, either in money or in kind, which have been levied after the 12th of the month, the day on which the armistice commenced, shall be restored and returned to the persons from whom they were levied.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE BOOTY.

ADDRESS MOVED.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, who had presented Petitions from Sir George C. Whitlock, K.C.B., and Major Generals E. Apthorp, E. Holt, W. Reece, and E. Miller, for Distribution of the Banda and Kirwee Booty, as recommended in the Report of the Royal Commission on Army Prize, proceeded to move an humble Address to Her Majesty thereon. The petitioners whose petitions he had presented to the House stated that the Royal Commission on Army Prize had recommended a distribution on the principle of actual capture ; and they asked, should there be any dispute as to the troops entitled upon that principle to have the matter referred to some competent judicial tribunal ? The petition concluded by praying that before the matter was concluded the House would interfere by praying Her Majesty to take steps to have the matter submitted to a fair and legal arbitration. That was the object at which his Motion pointed. He felt that he had a difficult task to perform, for the papers were voluminous and the case was complicated. He was anxious, at the beginning, to point out to the House the importance of the subject. It was not a question between one officer and another, or one force and another, but it lay at the root of the whole subject of army prize. Last Session, as the House would recollect, on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), an address to the Crown was unanimously agreed to, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Commission to inquire into the whole subject of army prize. That Commission was appointed, and its Report had been laid before Parliament. The Commissioners entirely confirmed the statements of his hon. and gallant Friend, in making the Motion, as to the great delay and consequent inconvenience in the distribution of prize money, and they said that that delay had often been such as to deprive the bounty of the Crown of its grace, and to create an impression that good faith had not been kept. The Commissioners had divided the causes of delay into three—the delay in the realization of the booty, the delay in fixing the principles on which it was to be distributed, and lastly, the delay in the actual distribution, and they had proposed a scheme by which these delays might be avoided, the cardinal point of which was that there should be some certainty as to the principles on which prize should be distributed. It was to the introduction of that principle of certainty that his present Motion pointed. It was a Motion in effect asking the Crown to restrict its prerogative. Of course he knew perfectly well, and he wished the Government to understand that it was admitted, that the prerogative of the Crown in the matter was absolute. There was no claim of right set up on the part of any person in the matter of army prize. Her Majesty might do what she pleased with any booty. She might build a palace with it, or she might give it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to clear off the debt, but in practice Her Majesty and her predecessors had for a very long time exercised their prerogative by giving up booty to the troops who had captured it. Naval prize had formerly stood in the same position as army prize now stood in ; but within the last century a system of distribution according to rule had been established, and a code built up by the decisions of the Court of Admiralty, by which naval prize was now distributed to the general satisfaction of the service. In the case of army prize the prerogative of the Crown had never been restricted in such a manner, but the Crown had always waited until after the booty was taken, and then had considered on what principles it should be distributed; and though the principles and precedents of naval prize were applicable to army prize, it was only to a certain extent, and the Treasury, which was the deciding body, had been obliged to refer to law officers, to distinguished military authorities and others, thus causing great delay. The Commission had drawn up a scheme by which the system of distributing army prize might be placed on a sound footing, and it was for the House now to consider whether, having asked the House for a Commission, it would go on to ask that the principles laid down by that Commission should be carried into effect and applied to this particular case, which he thought would be found to be a leading case. With regard to this case, he had taken it up without having any interest on either side, but simply because it involved a general principle which it was very desirable for the sake of the army at large to settle as soon as possible. At the time he took it up he was not aware that he had a single friend who had any interest in it. It was only lately that he had learnt he had two or three friends in India who were interested in the matter, but they had made no communications to him on the subject, and it was not at their instigation that he was proceeding with it. The reason why the parties had come to him was, he presumed, because he had formerly for a short time been connected with the Department which was supreme in these questions. Having said thus much, he should briefly state the facts on which his Motion was based. When Lord Clyde went out to India in the autumn of 1857 he found the mutiny had not drawn to a head at any one point; but that insurrection was springing up in various parts of Central India under different chiefs. There was not only Lucknow to be relieved, and Oude and Rohilcund to be pacified, but there was the vast territory between the Nerbudda on the south and the Jumna on the north with a number of independent leaders who were making war against British rule, and whom it was necessary to reduce to obedience. In order to accomplish these objects and to restore order everywhere, Lord Clyde saw it was expedient that an organized plan should be adopted, and he devised, in conjunction with the Government of India, a system of detached columns, which were to advance

through Central India, clear it from the enemy in all directions, and ultimately to meet his own army in the North. Before, however, that scheme had been decided upon between Lord Clyde and the Supreme Government, the Presidency of Madras had organized a similar movement, and had collected a force for service in Central India which was placed under the command of Sir George Whitlock. That being so, Lord Clyde took advantage of the column under General Whitlock's command, while he arranged that there should also be a column from Bombay under Sir Hugh Rose, and in conjunction with those two a third under General Roberts, each of which was to have its own line of action and to sweep the country of what might be called Central India to the Jumna, where they were all to put themselves into communication with the army of Lord Clyde. In pursuance of that arrangement Sir George Whitlock advanced from Madras in independent command of his own force. He encountered on his march the troops of the Nawab of Banda, and defeated them in an engagement which Lord Clyde had characterized as taking rank among the best actions of the war. The result was that the Nawab's army was dispersed, and that the Rajah of Kirwee, his relative and neighbour, became so terrified at the result that he entered into communications with the British authorities with the view of surrendering his town. Finding, however, that Sir George Whitlock, owing to the condition of his force, was not pressing on him so rapidly as he expected, he took courage, abandoned his intention of submission, and prepared to defend his territory. In the meantime Sir Hugh Rose had been carrying on that splendid campaign which filled everybody with admiration in Central India. In the course of his operations, he had been on more than one occasion in correspondence with Sir George Whitlock. He was engaged in the siege of Jhansi, and other operations, and at the time of the defeat of the Nawab of Banda it appeared probable that the two forces would be brought into communication for the purpose of attacking Calpi. Sir George Whitlock had offered to join Sir Hugh Rose for that purpose, but the town was taken before the co-operation could take place. Sir George Whitlock then pursued the line laid out for him. He marched to Kirwee, the Rajah of which gave way, and took possession of the town, in which he left a portion of his force, the troops of the Rajah having retired to the mountains. When, however, it was found that Sir George Whitlock was absent from the town, and that there was in it only a small number of British, the Rajah made an attempt to retake the place, but Sir George Whitlock came under the pressure of the most severe weather rapidly to its relief, and, saving it from capitulation, drove the enemy back into the mountains. Under those circumstances that gallant officer, not unnaturally, thought that he had a claim to the prize money taken at Banda and Kirwee, while the Government and the Treasury had decided, as the matter at present stood, that he and the force under his command were only in part entitled to the booty, and that Sir Hugh Rose's force was entitled to share. They had, however, suspended their decision to give the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion on it. That being so, it became necessary to consider what was the ground upon which the decision of the Government was based. So far as he could understand the papers, the claims of Sir Hugh Rose to a share of it were supported upon two grounds, the one being that the two forces were so combined that they must be regarded for the purpose of the distribution of prize, as the same; the other that the operations of Sir Hugh Rose were essential to, and were the cause of, the capture of Kirwee by Sir George Whitlock. The accuracy of both these allegations was, however, disputed by the representatives of Sir George Whitlock and his troops, and both appeared to involve questions of such delicacy and intricacy as to require the most careful study, and the most minute sifting of evidence. It was not a case which could satisfactorily be disposed of with closed doors, at the Treasury or any other Government Office, but one which required open and fair investigation. First, as to the claim of Sir Hugh Rose, founded on the supposed combination of the forces. How could they be considered a combined force, when they were under two distinct commanders? When two columns having different commanders were united, the senior officer took the command of the junior; but in that case there was not a single instance of an order having been given by Sir Hugh Rose, the senior officer, to Sir George Whitlock, or a report in the ordinary form of a report from an inferior to a superior having been addressed by the latter to the former until after the combination of the forces at a later period. But the case did not rest on the absence of such reports and orders; the tone of the letters which passed between them was such as to afford positive evidence that there was no such combination and co-operation as Sir Hugh Rose now relied upon. In one case Sir Hugh Rose, addressing General Whitlock, said, "I shall feel extremely obliged to you if you could as much as possible clear the Valley of the Nerbudda;" and in another, "I hope you will have the great goodness to bring up 5,500 bullock-loads of corn for my force." Was that the language which a commanding officer would use? The courtesy of Sir Hugh Rose was well known, but military discipline must have changed a good deal of late years if that was the way in which a superior officer wrote to another who was under his command. More than that, when Sir George Whitlock received a communication from Sir Hugh Rose he did not always comply with the request which it conveyed to him; and whenever Sir Hugh Rose desired to obtain the co-operation of Sir George Whitlock, he wrote, not to him, but to Lord Clyde, whose chief of the staff then communicated with Sir George Whitlock. And how did the chief of the staff make these communications? Did he direct General Whitlock to follow Sir Hugh Rose's orders? Not at all. Take the case of Calpee for instance. Sir Hugh Rose desired General Whitlock's aid. He wrote to Sir William Mansfield, as chief of the staff, on the subject, and Sir William Mansfield thereupon requested Sir George to co-operate with Sir Hugh Rose, if the state of his own district enabled him to do so, but left it entirely to himself to decide whether it would be prudent for him, and consistent with the attainment of the special objects of his force, to take such a step. Sir George Whitlock exercised the discretion which was left to him, and Calpee fell without his co-operation. What the effect would have been if he had gone there was a different question. He was now asking the House to consider what he actually did, and the fact was that he never went out of his district. Now, how could it be said that this was a case in which, with closed doors, without the power of cross-examination of witnesses, and without any argument, it was to be decided that the two forces were in combination? Co-operation of a certain kind there undoubtedly was between the two forces, but it was clear from the evidence contained in the blue-book that the Treasury did not consider that there was an absolute and clear combination. It was a new case; its decision would form a precedent, and, therefore, he maintained that his position was inexpugnable when he demanded, in the name of justice, that it should be submitted for the decision of a legal and judicial tribunal. Mr. Arbuthnot, one of the principal officers of the Treasury, a gentleman of high authority and well known to many hon. Members, stated, in his evidence before the Commission, that he was not aware of any exact precedent for two columns being concerned in combined operations under separate commands, and in the Minute of January, 1862, it was admitted that this case was to some extent peculiar. The answer given to him by the Government would no doubt be that it was an exceptional case; but he held it was more necessary to be cautious in dealing with an exceptional case than with an ordinary one. Then, as regarded the second ground taken by the Government. When it was asserted that the capture of Kirwee depended upon the success of Sir Hugh Rose, they were getting upon very delicate ground. Of course, in a certain sense, there was no doubt that the operations in all parts of India, whether at Lucknow, in Oude, in Rohilcund, or in other places, had a bearing and an influence upon each other; but when a distinct statement was made that the fall of Kirwee resulted from the success of Sir Hugh Rose's force, it was not only the pecuniary interest, but, to a certain extent, the honour also of Sir George Whitlock's force that was attacked. He did not wish to institute a comparison between the services of the two forces, but it should be remembered that the Madras force were the representatives of a faithful army; they had come a great distance out of their own district to the assistance of their country, and it was cruel to tell them that successes which they achieved without a shot being fired or a sword cut given by any force but their own were won, not by themselves, but by some one else. If the Government professed to act upon the principle that the operations of every force bore upon those of every other, and that each force had a right to share prize to the capture of which it might in this way have contributed, where was the line to be drawn? That was a practical question which had arisen in the course of this Correspondence. A brigade of Sir Henry Roberts's force, under the command of General Smith, claimed to share in the prize taken by Sir Hugh Rose's force, on the ground that it was in communication with it; but General Smith was at once informed that he had no case. General Smith, however, sent in his claim again, which was then admitted by the Secretary of State for India, and also, he believed, by Lord Clyde. It was disputed, however, substantially upon the same grounds by Sir William Mansfield and Sir Hugh Rose, the latter of whom appeared to take a very different view of what occurred on his right hand and what took place on his left. Sir William Mansfield said it was utterly impossible General Smith could have any claim, as he was not under Sir Hugh Rose's orders. General Smith was not, it is true, under Sir Hugh Rose, but neither was Sir George Whitlock. General Smith was represented as being 200 miles away, and unable to render any assistance; but at the time Kirwee fell, not only was Sir Hugh Rose many miles away, and unable to render General Whitlock any assistance, but he was actually hastening in exactly the opposite direction after Tantia Topce, who had seized Gwalior and seriously alarmed the British force in that part of the country. The fact was, that Sir Hugh Rose, so far from helping Sir George Whitlock, needed all the help he could get for himself. It appeared to him (Sir Stafford Northcote) to be idle to say that that force which had marched in an entirely opposite direction, was, nevertheless, entitled to claim the honours and advantages arising from the actual capture of Kirwee, whilst at the same time it was also maintained that General Smith's force should be shut out from all participation in the prize money, on the ground of its having had no share in the operations in question. That seemed to him to be a most monstrous and inconvenient doctrine. Once the doctrine of constructive capture was admitted, they involved themselves in all manner of gross inconsistencies. On this point it was most important to attend to the recommendations of the Committee on Army Prize—

"To give simplicity to all proceedings in matters of prize, and to facilitate despatch, it is essential that the principle of actual capture should be as closely adhered to as the nature of military operations permits. Any departure from this principle involves doubt, uncertainty, dissatisfaction, and delay; and any apparent want of equity which may arise from it in particular cases will, we believe, be willingly acquiesced in by the parties concerned as in the similar case of the navy, as one of the proverbial chances of war."

That was the true doctrine on which they ought to proceed. There was one consideration he knew which could not be excluded, and which must necessarily have great influence, not only with the Government, but with every Member of the House. He referred to the splendour of the services rendered by Sir Hugh Rose. No one could read the modest and spirited memorial which he had put forth on behalf of his own force without feeling his blood thrill at the great services rendered by Sir Hugh Rose in that wonderful campaign. Had the noble Lord come down to the House and proposed that some substantial tribute should be given to Sir Hugh Rose, in acknowledgment of his achievements against tremendous forces and under such critical circumstances, there was not a single hon. Member who would not have sympathized with the proposition. But it was a very different thing to confer honours and rewards upon Sir Hugh Rose at the expense of somebody else, who so far as the particular capture was concerned was equally if not more deserving. However high their admiration was for the general services of Sir Hugh Rose, they must not lose sight of the principle of fair play in the matter, and of common justice to the weaker and smaller force, which had borne an important part in the transactions to which he was referring. The Treasury treated it as an exceptional case on account of the largeness of the booty and the disparity of force between the different armies. In a Treasury Minute, dated 1862, they said—

“My Lords have already expressed their opinion that under the circumstances attending the capture of the booty in question a more extended principle of distribution should be adopted than that of actual capture, and they still retain the impression that having regard to the great value of the treasure, and the comparative numbers of the forces engaged in contiguous, if not combined, operations, it will be right to advise Her Majesty to exercise a discretion in the grant of the treasure, which remains at her free disposal. Yet they feel that any advice which may be tendered on the subject to Her Majesty should be governed by some well-defined principle, and that an arbitrary decision should be avoided, which might create a new precedent of inconvenient application to future cases, when possibly the conditions might be reversed, and the larger booty be taken by the larger force.”

If the authorities persevered in the system of guiding the distribution of booty by reference to its amount and the size of the relative forces engaged, they would be entering on a most dangerous course, and sowing the seeds of heartburnings and irritation that would no doubt extend throughout the British army. The unanimity of all the lawyers who had been consulted formed a curious feature of this case. Opinions had been given by Sir Roundell Palmer and Sir Robert Phillimore before they attained their official positions, by Sir Hugh Cairns, Mr. Rolt, Mr. Montague Smith, that most eminent authority Mr. H. Prendergast, and by Dr. Travers Twiss, and they all affirmed the exclusive claim of Sir G. Whitlock to the prize money in question, if the decision were quoted only by military precedents. So much for the view of the lawyers. On the part of the officials what did he find? He must say that of all the involved cases he ever read in his life he never met with one more confusing. The protest by Mr. Wiloughby and other Members of the Indian Council against the decision of the Secretary of State excellently summarized the various opinions entertained—

“In August, 1861, the Secretary of State for India in Council was of opinion that the Kirwee booty should be divided between the three field forces, and that Lord Clyde and his personal staff should share. We now reiterate this opinion, but admit that as far as regards Sir H. Roberts' force, the information is not so direct. Lord Clyde thinks that Sir H. Rose's force, and a brigade detached from Sir H. Roberts' force (Smith's) should share, but not Sir H. Roberts' force generally. He would also include the chief of his staff and the adjutant-general of the Bengal army. The Secretary of State for War and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge concur with Lord Clyde, except that they would not include Sir William Mansfield and Lieutenant Colonel Norman. The prize agents, whose memorial has been received from the Lords of the Treasury, contend for the observance of the principle of actual capture, which would give the whole booty, to Sir G. Whitlock's force. The Lords of the Treasury, in a very able minute, propose a compromise—namely, that a moiety shall be assigned to the actual captors, and that the other moiety should be divided between the three columns. But they suggest that the Law Officers of the Crown should be consulted, and that, should they entertain any doubt, then that the case should be submitted for the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty.”

Since then Sir Hugh Rose had made his claim, the ground upon which he did so, after his previous inactivity, being explained in the passage where he expressed his belief that the principle of constructive capture had been allowed. A leading question had virtually been put to him, and he naturally did his best for the force under his command. General Smith's claim followed, and the list, they might depend, was not yet exhausted. He asked the House to deal with this question not as between man and man, but as involving
